THE DEATH OF DAN'S DOG.

Two lads of this town their names I'll not mention,
To kill Trelford's dog was their special intention;
For tearing Maud's stockings,
And Billie's blue britches.

When Dan trotted off with the dog on a halter,
And Tom with his musket came quietly after;
So Dan tied the dog to an old rotten root,
And Tom crept along and made ready to shoot.

Says Dan, are you sure the gun goes off easy?
For if Rover gets back little Jack will go crazy,
When Dan he looked back and started to grin,
While Tom to the gun trigger tied a long string.

Tom stood around till he made a good figure,
Took deliberate aim and then pulled the trigger,
Click went the hammer but little exploded,
Ah! sure muttered Dan, the gun is not loaded.

So Dan took the gun and pricked up the powder,
Remarking to Tom it would make it go louder,
And pointed the piece in the proper direction,
When off went the gun like a country election.

Dan pulled on the trigger without any suspection,
While the force of the bullet spoiled Rovers complection;
And Dan he went off in another direction,
So Tom said 'twas better for Dan on the section.

So Rover got loose by breaking the halter,
And over he went right into the water,
While Dan with a stick to kill him he tried,
Till the blood of poor Rover did crimson the tide.

But Rover was hardy and made his way out,
And Daniel you bet he looked down in the mouth,
Now Tom you steal around and drive the dog out,
And I'll watch with a stick and give him a clout.

Dan kicked the dog 'til his toes they were sore.
While in his poor hide were nine bullets or more,
When Dan had got home he found at the door,
Poor Rover all wounded battered and sore.

There is just one thing more to say,
Ne'er try to give the boys away;
For if you do you'l find it true,
The lads will be too much for you.

Ned says it is not square,
Jack said he did not care,
Bill says he was not there,
And Will has more than he can bear.

STRATFORD, Aug. 13th, 1885
It is with pleasure I bear testimony to the wonderful efficacy of Dr. Jug's medicine from which I have received great relief. I have been using both the medicine and pills since last winter since which time I have been gaining strength daily and am now nearly fit for business, while during seven years previous have been entirely unfit to do any kind of work. I kept the medicine constantly on hand and cannot speak too highly in its praise. I tried numerous remedies but received no relief until I tried Dr. Jug's Medicine, and will be most happy to recommend it to all who may apply to me for reference. I remain, your yours truly.
WILLIAM WARBURTON.

FREE TRADE.
The reduction of internal revenue and the taking off of revenue stamps from Proprietary Medicine, no doubt has largely benefitted the consumers, as well as relieving the burden of home manufactures. Especially is this the case with Green's August Flower and Boschee's German Syrup as the reduction of twenty-six cents per dozen, has been added to increase the size of the bottle containing these remedies, thereby giving one-fifth more medicine in the 75 cent size, The August Flower for Dyspepsia and Liver Complaint and the German Syrup for Cough and Lung troubles, have perhaps, the largest sale of any medicine in the world. The advantage of increased size of the bottle will be greatly appreciated by the sick and afflicted, in every town and of village civilized countries. Sample bottles for 10 cents remain the same size.

CONSUMPTION CURED.
An old physician, retired from practice, having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a similar vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure for Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh Asthma and all throat and Lung Afflictions, also a positive and radical cure for nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints, after having testified its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge to all who desire it, this receipe, in German, French or English, with full directions for preparing and using. HEALTH.

Plain Living and High Thinking.

A contributor to Good Housekeeping writes as follows upon this subject:—

Wheat bears the same relation to other grains that the Anglo-Saxon bears to other races. It is the most mature, perfect, and satisfactory of all foods. The ripest thought, the most consummate wisdom, the most solid productions of the brain, must have healthy nutrition as their basis. Thought is made out of something, and a portion of that something is food. How food is converted into nerve force, and that refined still further into intangible mental action, ceaselessly and beautifully, day and night, through the long years of our mortal existence, none can tell. It would take a higher order of beings to see and understand the delicate mechanism by means of which the warp and woof of mind or soul are woven.

We look with awe upon the result; but the most ignorant among us can see just as much as the most learned. Nature is a cunning chemist, and her secret laboratory is impenetrable. Issuing from it are productions of ravishing beauty or repulsive deformity. The quality depends both on the materials given her to use, and the conditions which surround her workmanship, and finally upon something subtle and mysterious which works through law, and underlies it all.

There is no doubt that the quality of our affections as well as our thoughts, is greatly influenced by our dietary. The man who eats pork, thinks pork; if he eats bread he thinks bread. And too much luxury without self-restraint fosters the growth of useless habits, just as a hot-bed fosters rank weeds that require extermination to let good growths come to maturity. It is the use we make of things that brings real riches or poverty.

Firm health is the result of many agencies, and of these, it is true, a good dietary is only one. Consumption, that scourge in many parts of our land, is developed and made fatal by the lack of it. A consumptive is often brilliant in mind and beautiful in character,—the brilliance and beauty of a being burning rapidly to extinction. Let us have more stupidity,—with health, happiness, and long life. Let us live nearer to nature, while yet preserving our aspirations, refinements and enjoyments. The song of a bird, the murmur of a brook, the fragrance and hue of a flower, the floating clouds across the blue either, and—

> "Dewy morn and odorous noon and even,
> With sunset and its georgous ministaies,
> And solemn midnight's tingling silentness," all will waken in us "thoughts that often lie too deep for tears."

Plain living should include true elegance and culture and a wide intelligence. The "shoddy" are never simple. They overload food, furniture, and personal adornment, as if the ends of life were accumulation and show. Pretention is always vulgar, and vulgarity is generally ostentatious. The "nouveau riche" are often detrimental to the nation. A writer has wisely said: "Greece was never more adorned with arts, fuller of schools, more resonant of music, richer in genius, more showy in religious sacrifices, than when she was struck with hopeless death. It was the decay of virtue, the triumph of selfish over public good, the absence of self-denial, the enervation of luxury, the pride of vain philosophy, the hypocrisy of religion, that killed her." And the use of history is to correct our own mistakes in the light of past experience.

The good housekeeper shows her wisdom by the well-being of the inmates of her home, physically first, then mentally and morally. She knows that home cannot be kepe worthy and happy without effort. She studies the temperament of each member of the family, and furnishes him or her with the food needed. The sanguine and full blooded require one kind; the nervous and wiry another. Good taste rules the serving of the viands, but the viands are first selected to build up muscle and nourish brain, not to pamper and enervate. Otherwise, energy, capacity, and integrity are weakened, and the power to do good work is gone.

It is related by a gentleman who had an invitation to breakfast with the late A. T. Stewart, that the butler placed before them both an elaborate bill of fare. The visitor selected a list of rare dishes, and was quite abashed when Mr. Stewart said, "Bring my usual breakfast,—oatmeal and eggs." He then explained to his friend that he found simple food a necessity to him; otherwise he could not think clearly. That unobscured brain applied to nobler ends would have wen higher results, but the principle remains the same.

Hard Study Not Unhealthful.

The exercise of the brain, under the proper conditions, is no more unhealthful than the exercise of the arm, or of any other part of the body. It was made for use. Its functions are as essential to life and health as those of the stomach or lungs, and its full and powerful development is essential to the highest health and perfection of the bodily powers. Like all other parts of the body, the brain is subject to waste, and demands nourishment, more, in proportion to its size, than any other organ of the body. The fresh air, general exercise, and proper alternations of repose required for the health of all other parts of the physical system, are also requisite for a healthy brain; and these being withheld will kill a student as quick as it will another man, but no quicker. That many students lose health is owing not to hard study, but to close confinement with out fresh air, and to insufficient general exercise. Intellectual efforts ought to promote health, and doubtless do when the other portions of the body are not sacrificed for it. We are not so badly constructed that, in order to be fat, we must consent to be fools; nor is a dyspeptic stomach the necessary companion to a wise head.

Only the best and the worst students usually show injury,—the best because of overwork and under-rest, bad air, and inaction; the worst because of idleness and dissipation. Students between the two classes usually escape injury, except as they approach either one or the other of the classes named.

The marking system in our collegs, while it has certain advantages which professors are quite ready to perceive and use, is fraught with so many dangers and positive evils that it can scarcely be defended. The system of college honors, which usually stands connected with and crowns the system of marking, is another of those bad and dangerous usages to which we expose college life. It is questionable whether the public exercises with which the school year of our public high schools is usually closed, have not the same bad effects. And worst of all, the stimulation excited by these systems of which I have spoken is as unfriendly to sound scholarship and real intellectual power as it is to good health.

Too Mean for His Own Good.

Mr. M. was a New-York merchant of much enterprise and large experience. He had one weakness, of which it was out of the question to break him. With him good quality was always secondary to low price. If he could buy anything cheap, he didn't mind if it wasn't so good. The firm of which he was the head had, among other ventures, a candle factory, a risky kind of property, because it contained so many combustible materials. Mr. M. took out policies of insurance, but, his first consideration being to pay the least possible premium, he dealt with rather shaky companies. His junior partner, feeling uneasy about the matter, quietly insured the concern one day for $20,000 in first-class companies, paying 5 per cent. premium, taking particular care not to let the senior know anything about it. One morning the discovery was made that the factory was completely destroyed by fire. Mr. M., as soon as he reached the office, called for the policies. When his eye lighted on those that had been obtained without his knowledge he exclaimed: "Who paid 5 per cent. premium on these policies?" "I did," said his associate. "What was the use of that? I never paid but 3½ per cent, for any that I took!" And notwithstanding the house was $19,000 ahead on the operation, the venerable gentleman refused to be comforted, because his partner had paid out $300 more than he thought there was any need of.

STATISTICS.

There are probably now something like 12,000,000 sheep in Cape Colony, besides over 3,000,000 goats.

The number of parcels carried during the first year of the existence of the Parcels Post was 15,000,000. Last year no fewer than 30,000,000 were safely delivered, being an increase of 100 per cent. in 3 years.

The total trade of the Straits Settlements amounts to about £40,000,000 sterling, one-half representing exports. The trade of the colony is almost equal to that of Canada, and of New South Wales and of Victoria, and nearly three times that of New Zealand.

According to Mulhali, the stock of gold coined and uncoined in the world in 1850 was £630,000,000 sterling, and in 1885 £1,504,000,000, an increase of £874,000,000; but the amount of imports and exports increased from £771,000,000 in 1850 to £2,953,000,000 in 1884, so that the world was able to do £2,182,000,000 more trade with only £874,000,000 more money.

The areas of India and of China proper are nearly the same—about 1,500,000 square miles. On Indian estimates, China proper should contain some 282,000,000 souls, which shows no great discrepancy with the latest official Chinese returns; while the great central Chinese plateau, with its 3,000,000 square miles of mountains, wilderness, and waterless desert, is roughly assumed to have a population of 15,000,000.

A Great Man.

"Does your wife ever pay you any compliments?" asked Frederick Jimson of his friend Benderly.

"Never," replied Benderly.

"Well, mine does. She flatters me."

"Often?"

"Oh, yes, frequently; particularly in Winter," replied Frederick.

"Why does she taffy you so much in Winter?"

"Whenever the coal fire needs replenishing she points to the fireplace and says, 'Frederick, the grate.'"

What He Worked at During Summer.

"Say, Mister, don't yer want a boy?"

"Are you out of work?"

"Yes."

"What did you do during the summer?"

"I stuck flies onto fly-paper in druggists' winders; but fly time's over now."

An Alaskan Forest.

Lieut. Schwatka thus describes the wonders of an Alaskan glacial forest:

Wandering around near camp I was struck with astonishment at the great size of the trees of the forest into which we had crept. The most astonishing part was that such a forest should be found actually surrounded by ice 10 to 20 miles across in every direction. Of course, it is reasonable to suppose that trees were here before the ice, and that the forest probably once connected with the forests of the great flat lands.

Here was undoubted evidence that this small forest was being obliterated rapidly by the advancing front of the Guyot Glacier, the foot ice grinding the huge trees into pulp and splinters as surely as a quartz crusher grinds the rock into powder. Trees five and six feet through were bent over and splintered as if they were brush, while some of the fallen trunks were split longitudinally into perfect kindling-wood.

It was the mills of the gods grinding slowly, etc. Nor were they grinding so very slowly, either, as one could see by comparing them with other glacial action near by. But a little way off, probably a half-mile to a mile away, was a small clump of woods into which the glacier in the past had protruded, as shown by the fallen, shattered trunks that lay near the edge of a small moraine from which the glacier had now retreated a great number of rods. Out from the bristling line of shattered tree-trunks piled over each other for nearly or fully a hundred yards all the spruce-trees were dead, but still standing, their whitened trunks and long, gaunt limbs contrasted strangely and conspicuously with the trees still covered with foliage that formed their background. These dead evergreens had been actually killed by the proximity to the ice without its touching them, and either by its chilling influence kept up throughout the year for probably centuries, or the constant application of the ice-water about the roots, preventing their growth; for along this foot-ice there was always a marshy stream of ice-water draining off to the nearest muddy creek or rill. This was true of the glacier foot not over fifty yards from our camp in the forest, for here we got our water for cooking purposes, but here also the ice of the glacier had evidently come forward so fast that the trees were rather killed by direct crushing of their trunks and limbs than by the slower one of the influence of great masses of ice near by, and it was possible to sit down on this foot-ice of the Guyot Glacier, probably ten to twenty feet thick at that point, and at the same time be under the shade of a huge evergreen-tree, if a person desired two such cooling influences at the same time.

Thus I came to the conclusion that the front of this great glacier was like the fingers of some huge radiating animal prolonging themselves outward and retracting again at long intervals that would require many human lives one after the other to measure a single stride and its backward flow.

Fashions in Medicines.

A druggist has discovered that patent medicines have their fashions like hats and walking sticks. There was a time when plasters were all the rage, but after sticking to them for some years public taste changed, and then kidney and liver medicines came into vogue. People who never knew they had kidneys began to take stuff that they heard was good for them, and men like Helmbold got rich. Bitters were in style universally at one time. A man whose sideboard wasn't provided with half a dozen different varieties of bitters was considered old-fashioned and destitute of chic. He was destitute of stomach, too, if he kept the bitters racket going too long. Then there was the craze for pads. There were lung pads, and liver pads, and kidney pads, and foot pads. Writing pads came in about this time, too. No man with any style about him at all failed to go to his druggist and be measured for a pad. With a full line of pads properly adjusted undershirts were superfluous. Cough remedies are having their innings now, there being something like 300 in the market already, with any number of doctors and professors sitting up nights concocting more.

Achieved Greatness and Kept It.

"Yes, sir," remarked a prominent politician. "I have held office for twenty-three years."

"Twenty-three years!" was the astonished reply. "That's a long time to stay great."

LADIES' APRONS.

No. 1.—Lady's apron made of etamine or scrim, trimmed with velvet bands and girdle of a contrasting color, and cross-stitch embroidery done in harmonizing tints. Individual taste can be exercised in the selection of materials and trimmings, and the length and width of the apron can be decided by the preference of the wearer. The skirt should reach some distance below the knees, and in width should well cover the front of the dress. The bib should reach up to the bust, but if made too high it will appear awkward.

No. 2.—This is made of straight breadths ponges laid in broad box-plaits, and the interverning spaces ornamanted with horizontal rows of narrow velvet bow ribbon. The bottom is trimmed with embroidery done on the same material, with silk matching the color of the velvet ribbon. The bib is made to correspond with the skirt of the apron, and the belt is of velvet finished with a velvet bow on the left side. This apron can also be made up in cream-color or any bright tint of India silk, and the stripes can be made of velvet or satin ribbon of any contrasting color, the belt and bow to be of the same. Scrim could be used for the purpose, the threads drawn for the stripes and narrow ribbon run in; or a striped and plain fabric can be combined; or the same goods used throughout. Lace can be substituted for the embroidery with any goods. The same general directions should be observed in regard to width and length as for No. 1.

HERE AND THERE.

On the 31st of May last the approximate number of sheep in New Zealand was 15,200,000, being an increase of 354,000 on the previous year. In Otago the number of sheep increased during the year from 3,000,000 to 2,957,000.

Tobacco cultivation has proved an unmistakable success in New South Wales. The leaf is said to be of excellent quality, equal to any obtained from Cuba or Manilla. It is retained principally for home consumption.

"Around the world in eighty days" no longer is heard from the lips of the wide-awake. It is, like the old "2:40 on a plank road" phrase, out-dated. "Around the world in sixty-nine days" is the true time—via the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Some of the officers employed in taking the census of the Maori population of New Zealand reported that where marriages between persons belonging to distinct tribes take place the progeny are both numerous and healthy. Where members of the same tribe intermarry the reverse is almost always the case.

During a severe thunderstorm at Wellsville, Mo., last August, a vivid flash of lightning photographed on the smooth white ceiling of the Methodist Church the face of an old man with long flowing hair and beard. It is described as a weird and shadowy portrait, and the superstitious say that it is the photograph of the storm king.

In Oregon the canning and catching of salmon employ 2,000 white men in various capacities. It employs 2,500 Chinese. It employs fifteen tugs and steamboats, and makes business for half a dozen more employed regularly in the traffic of the river. It employs, besides, hundreds of boat-makers, sailmakers and net weavers.

The sole survivor of the American slave auctioneers, Mr. John Campbell, has given to the world his confessions, which are said to be exceedingly interesting. He became a slave auctioneer in 1835, and carried on the business for nearly twenty-six years, during which period he sold no fewer than 15,000 human beings.

Whole wheat is not much known in this country as food, though it is largely used in England. Of course it is both healthful and nutritious, though to be easily digested it requires long boiling. Then with butter and sugar it makes a dish fit for an epicure. It was the dish always served in England among farmers in the olden time at the conclusion of the wheat harvest.

It is now claimed that celery is a sure cure for rheumatism; indeed, it is asserted the disease is impossible if the vegetable be cooked and freely eaten. The fact that it is always put on the table raw, prevents its therapeutic power from being known. The celery should be cut into bits, boiled until soft, and the water drank by the patient. Serve warm with pieces of toasted bread, and the painful ailment will soon yield.

A calf was killed and the hide taken off in Zionsville, Lehigh County, Pa., in the morning. The skin was taken to Charles Burkhalter's tannery at noon. By evening of the same day Mr. Burkhalter had it all tanned and promptly handed it to a shoemaker. By next morning a pair of boots was completed and put on by the owner, so that what was on living flesh of a calf one day was a pair of boots the next. It was without doubt, the quickest tanning on record.

By order of the Duke of Cambridge the prohibition against soldiers smoking in the streets has just been removed, and the following clause has been substituted for the last sentence of paragraph 18, Sec. 7, Queen's Regulations and Orders for the Army, 1885: "Soldiers are not to go beyond the precincts of their barracks unless properly dressed, and they are not to smoke in the streets until after 5 p. m. from the 1st October to the 31st March, or 6 p. m. from the 1st April to the 30th September."

The following report of Inspector Smith on the Murray Bay prison rather enlivens the dullness of wading through a blue book:—"The inspection was made on the 15th July by Inspector Smith. There were three prisoners who remained in jail because they liked it, as they took no advantage of the many opportunities given them of escaping either by the main gate, which was nearly always open, or while the jailer was absent. The walls were dirty and the plaster needed repairing."

The English Commissioners of Forests are planting extensively on the Crown property in the Isle of Man. About four millions of trees have been planted on mountain land during the last three years, and the work has improved so successfully that it has been decided to extend the number of trees annually. The planting is done almost entirely by native labor, under the superintendence of a competent forester from Carlisle, most of the trees having been ordered from the well-known nurseries of Knowefield in that city.

Among the old papers in the county clerk's office in Freehold, N. J., is the death sentence of a negro named Cæsar. It reads: "Therefore the court doth judge that thou, the said Cæsar, shall turn to the place from whence thou comest, and from thence to the place of execution, where thy right hand shall be cut off and buried before thine eyes. Then thou shall be hanged up by the neck until thou art dead, dead, dead; then thy body shall be cut down and burned to ashes in a fire, and so the Lord have mercy on thy soul, Cæsar."

The year 1886 marks the ter-centenary of the introduction of potatoes and tobacco into Europe. Considering how universally they are consumed now, it is almost a wonder how the Eastern world pulled through without them prior to 1586. Tobacco has had of the two the more checkered career. It has been denounced from thrones and pulpits; yet it has been the solace of some of our greatest men, as for example, Carlyle, Kingsley and Tennyson. Though in some respects injurious, it has contributed in no small degree to the comfort of manhood.

A gentleman was sketching with a brother artist in a favorite resort of the craft when a gentleman came up and entered into conversation. The stranger offered some friendly criticism and advice to the younger of the two sketchers, which the latter resented by telling his would-be mentor, that, though kindly meant, his suggestions were wrong, and showed a lack of artistic knowledge. "There," said the young artist afterwards, "I think I have disposed that fellow effectually." "Ah," said the other, "he took it very mildly. That was the great John Everett Millias."

YOUNG FOLKS.

BOYS WHO BECAME FAMOUS.

BY DAVID KER.

FACING THE MUTINEERS.

One clear, bright morning, in the latter part of the seventeenth century, all Moscow—which was the capital of Russia at that time—was in an uproar such as it had never seen since its foundation by Prince Michael Tverakoi three hundred years before. At first sight one might have thought that it had just been stormed by a hostile army, for the whole interior of its famous citadel, the Kremlin, was one whirl of savage faces and wild figures, armed with spears, swords, and muskets.

The fact was that the Strelitz Guard of Moscow had broken out in open revolt, as they did almost every month now that there was no one in Russia strong enough to keep them in check; for the Czar himself was a mere child, and among all his ministers there was not one who was not as weak as he was worthless. The mutineers came pouring into the Kremlin by hundreds, loudly threatening to burn the palace and kill the Czar unless they got what they wanted; and what they really wanted neither they nor any one else seemed to know.

Upon the great staircase of the palace, looking down on the howling rabble below, stood a few scared-looking chamberlains and officers of the court, who were grouped around two richly dressed boys, the one barely twelve years old, and the other even younger.

No one would easily have guessed from the dull heavy face and vacant look of the elder lad—who was so short-sighted as to be almost blind, and so weak-minded as to be little better than an idiot—that this was really the Czar himself. He certainly did not behave in a very kingly way, for he was actually cowering behind his younger brother instead of encouraging and protecting him.

But the younger boy looked like one who would need little protection from anybody. His muscular frame, extraordinarily tall and strong for his years, had a dignity which was wholly wanting to his brother's slouching figure; and even in that deadly peril there was no sign of fear in his dark, firm face, which wore upon its boyish features the stern calmness of mature age.

"Don't be frightened, Vania" (Johnny), said to his trembling brother, as the rioters came rushing and roaring to the foot of the stair; "they daren't hurt us."

"Daren't we?" roared a fierce soldier, springing up the steps, and actually touching the brave lad's breast with his spear point. "What do you say now?"

"I say," answered the boy, with a gleam in his large black eyes which Russia's enemies knew to their cost in after days, "that you daren't touch either of us."

For an instant the grim spearman stood hesitating, half cowed and half enraged by the boy's defiant coolness. One moment more, and a single blow would have changed the whole history of Russia, when another Guardsman caught his comrade's arm, shouting:

"Don't waste time on him, Stepka [Stephen]. See, those fellows have broken into the palace already. Come along, and let's get our share of the plunder before it's all gone."

In fact, the other doors had already been forced open, and instantly the fierce Guardsmen swarmed through the whole palace, tearing down the rich hangings, carrying off gold and silver ornaments, breaking the furniture and statues, thrusting their spears through the splendid paintings on the walls, while the vaulted chambers echoed with their savage yells and hoarse bellowing laughter. Every moment the uproar and confusion grew more and more terrific, till the few anxious watchers on the stairs began to fear that the rioters would end their plundering with the massacre of every living thing in the palace.

But all of a sudden the maddening din melted into a dead silence, while figures loaded with booty were seen retreating hurriedly across the court-yard. The loyal troops quartered outside the town had taken the alarm, and were hastening to the rescue; and at their approach the mob of mutineers, unofficered and almost unarmed (for many of them had flung away their weapons in order to plunder more easily), thought it best to retire with their booty as quickly as possible.

The palace was soon cleared of the rioters, and the General in command of the loyal forces made his way up to the staircase, on which the two young Princes were still standing.

"Do not be afraid," said he, cheerily; "it's all over now."

"Afraid!" echoed the younger boy, disdainfully. "It is not for a Romanoff to be afraid of a rabble of mutinous ruffians; and if ever I come to be Czar I will teach these brawlers who is their master."

How that boy kept his word in after-years may now be read in any history of Russia; and the traveller who visits Moscow to-day sees along the Kremlin wall a row of small red turrets, and is told by his Russian friends that for every one of those turrets a mutinous Guardsman was beheaded in front of that wall by Peter the Great.

Why Ned went to Bed so Early.

Mamma was reading down stairs in the parlor.

Suddenly she jumped up and said, "I wonder what Ned and Tot are doing?"

She went to the back door and called, but no answer. Then to the front door, but she could see nothing of them.

Then she went up stairs.

It was so very quiet she was sure of mischief.

She met Ned at the bedroom door, with a very dirty face and a strange look in his eyes. But where was Tot?

Mamma began to be a little frightened.

"Tot, where are you?" called mamma.

"Here I are," answered a little voice sounding far away.

Mamma rushed across the room, almost upsetting the huge clothes-hamper that stood in the centre of the room, when a little "Oh!" made her lift the cover, and there in the bottom of the hamper sat two-year-old Tot with a large fruit cake mamma had made the day before in his lap.

And such a cake! Little fingers had taken all the fruit out, leaving holes all over the cake.

"I put him there and gave him the cake. It was the splendidest cake I ever had, mamma," said Ned.

And that is why Ned went to bed so early without any supper that afternoon.

HOUSEHOLD.

About Patching and Darning.

The people in this world who get beyond the use of patches on garments are few and exceedingly foolish. We formerly knew the wife, now deceased, of a millionaire who to her dying day took great pride in her ability to patch clothes neatly, not from parsimonious motives, but because she was a very sensible woman. Our esteem for the lady was all the greater on this account.

But not every one is able to neatly lay a patch or darn a rent who desire to do so, hence we advance a few helpful suggestions: In patching start by cutting a piece of material of a size slightly larger than to completely cover the worn place. Cut it accurately by the thread; nothing looks more untidy than a crooked patch with unshapely corners.

Next turn in a narrow fold on the four sides of the patch, lay it in place outside the worn part and tack fast. Sew it on all around, either like a seam, or else fell it. If it lies close and flat the tacking thread may then come away.

Now the work must go on from the wrong side, by first cutting away the worn piece, leaving enough margin to turn in as for a hem. Cut little nicks at the corners to allow it to lie flat, and fell it all around. The corners should be as well shaped as are those of the patch. To have the piece square on the right side, and then an ill-shaped circle of much smaller dimensions on the wrong side, as one sometimes sees, is to spoil the work so far as looks go.

To neatly match the stripes or figure of the garment by the new material is one-half in doing fine patching. When a patch is completed lay an old handkerchief or other thin cloth even it and press out with a hot iron.

Flannel may be mended in the same way as described, only that instead of the edges being folded in, leave flat, and instead of being felled they should be herring-boned all round.

Sheets and similar articles that are worn thin by long use, and are too weak to patch must be darned. For this, real darning cotton, not that used for stockings, but a soft, fine article made for the purpose, should be used.

When darning take quite half an inch extra on either side, and not just the very thin place itself and that only. If so done there is danger of the mended part not getting through the first wash without breaking out. By running several lines of strong sewing cotton round the thin part before doing the darning it will strengthen the foundation greatly, and will not show afterwards.

Use a long, fine darner for fine fabrics, a thicker one for coarser cloth. Take a thread and miss two threads uniformly, going straight across. Leave a moderate loop at the end to allow for shrinking, turn and go back again, getting your stitches on a line with each other.

Waste In the Kitchen.

Waste in the kitchen is often very great from apparently trivial sources.

In cooking meats the water is thrown out without removing the grease, or the grease from the dripping-pan is thrown away.

Scraps of meat are thrown away.

Cold potatoes are left to sour and spoil.

Dried fruits are not looked after and become wormy.

Victuals are left exposed to be eaten by mice.

Bones of meat and the carcass of turkey are thrown away, when they could be used in making good soups.

Sugar, tea, coffee, and rice are carelessly spilled in the handling.

Soap is left to dissolve and waste in the water.

Dish-towels are used for dish-cloths.

Napkins are used for dish-towels.

Towels are used for holders.

Brooms and mops are not hung up.

More coal is burned than necessary by not arranging dampers when not using the fire.

Lights are left burning when not used.

Tin dishes are not properly cleansed and dried.

Good new brooms are used in scrubbing kitchen floors.

Silver spoons are used in scraping kettles.

Vinegar is left to stand until the tin vessel becomes corroded and spoiled.

Pickles become spoiled by the leaking out or evaporation of the vinegar.

Pork spoils for want of salt, and beef because the brine wants scalding.

Hams become tainted or filled with vermin for want of care.

Cheese molds and is eaten by mice and vermin.

Tea and coffee pots are injured on the stove.

Woodenware is unscalded and left to warp and crack.

Recipes.

CORN BREAD.—One pint of corn meal, one pint of flour, one-half cup of molasses, one teaspoon of soda, one teaspoon of salt. Bake in a slow oven, or steam one hour.

CORN MEAL MUFFINS.—One cup of flour, one cup of corn meal, one cup of sour milk, one teaspoon of salt, one tablespoon of melted butter, one teaspoon of sugar. Bake in gem irons, in quick oven.

GINGER SNAPS.—One cup of molasses, one cup of sugar, two-thirds cup of lard, one-third cup of cold water, one tablespoon of soda, one tablespoon ginger, flour sufficient to roll. Put molasses, sugar, lard and water in a pan, and set it on the stove till it comes to a boil, then remove it and let it cool, after which add soda, ginger and flour. Roll thin and bake in quick oven.

SPICE CAKE.—One cup of sugar, one-half cup of butter, yolks of three eggs, one-half cup of sweet milk, one and one-half cups of flour, one-half cup of currants, one teaspoon of baking powder, spice to taste. Proceed in the usual manner of cake making. Dredge the currants with flour before adding them to the cake.

CORN STARCH CAKE.—One cup of sugar, one-half cup of butter, whites of three eggs, one-half cup of sweet milk, one teaspoon of baking powder, one and one-half cups of flour, one-half cup of corn starch. Rub butter and sugar to a cream; stir in milk; add a portion of the flour, then the whites of eggs, stiffly beaten, and remaining flour and starch. Flavor to taste.

LEMON CAKE.—One cup of sugar, one-half cup of butter, three eggs, one-half cup of sweet milk, one and one-half cups of flour, one teaspoon of baking powder, one lemon. Cream the butter and sugar; beat in yolks of eggs; add milk, portion of flour, beaten whites of eggs, grated rinde of lemon, remaining flour, and last the juice of lemon. Beat the cake thoroughly and get it into the oven as quickly as possible. It must not stand after the lemon is added.

TOMATO CATSUP.—One-half bushel of tomatoes, three large onions, one quart of cider vinegar, one cup of brown sugar, one tablespoon of salt, whole allspice, cinnamon, cloves and red pepper to taste. Scald and peel the tomatoes, add to them the onions, peeled and cut in small pieces, and boil till all are perfectly tender. Strain through a sieve, add vinegar, sugar and spices, replace on the stove and boil two hours.

Is the Gulf Stream Changing?

Captain J. W. Reynolds, of the steamship City of Alexandria, which arrived from Havana the other day, added his testimony to the eccentric action of the Gulf Stream. He says: "The course that I usually follow coming from Havana usually gives me from a three to a three and one-half knot current along the Florida coast, and nearly to the latitude of Savannah, and from there to Hatteras a two to two and one-half knot current. The current is stronger, however, in the summer than in the winter, and knowing this I took particular pains to choose the course where I could expect the most favorable current. Along the Florida coast, where I expected a three-knot current, its strength was not more than one knot, and from below Savannah to Cape Hatteras I had no current at all. We usually see strong ripples along the edge of the Gulf Stream, but I saw none on this trip. I don't know the cause of this change, but I can hardly attribute it to the effect of strong gales in setting the current back. From Havana to the Florida coast we had a moderate head sea, and thence a smooth sea up to Sandy Hook. The winds were from the westward rather than the north, and the barometer was steady."

A Rain of Shot.

Among the phenomena reported from South Carolina during the earthquake engagement, was rain falling from a perfectly cloudless sky. This is surpassed, however, by a story told by two Charleston gentlemen, traveling in the interior about that time, who were treated to a shower of shot, and neither of the gentlemen was "shot" at the time, either. The war had been over too long for it to be any spent shot fired by the blue or the gray, and not even a shot tower was in sight. They gathered some of it up after it had continued at intervals for some time, and found it to be the ordinary shot used by sportsmen. Where it came from is a mystery. Perhaps it came from some comet as it shot through the air.

The Boss Liar.

The train had started off. A young man rushed breathlessly into the depot.

"Got left did you?" said the ticket seller.

"Of course I got left," he responded.

Then some one said he could go across the bridge and catch the train, and another told him when the next train would go, and various suggestions were made. The chap looked at the disappearing train a few seconds, when some one asked:

"Where were you going?"

Then the wicked fellow said, "Oh, I wasn't going in the train. My wife's mother is on that train and I wanted to kiss her before she left."

"Liar!" roared twenty-four married men in chorus.

A Symptom of Lunacy.

They meet.

"So you are still on the invalid list?"

"Alas, yes, and I have taken gallons of medicine."

"Perhaps you take too much medicine."

"Well, I've tried everything. Last Summer I tried sea bathing and now I am trying electricity."

"No wonder you are in bad health after going through salt and battery."

And then as the awful truth dawned upon them, they both burst into maniac laughter and fled from the scene.

A Satisfactory Explanation.

"Something you wanted, madam?" he queried as she was going out of the store.

"Why, I came in for a pair of shoes, and I've waited twenty minutes and no one has come near me. I've got tired."

"Wait just one minute," he whispered. "I've spent twenty-five minutes with this lady with the big feet, but it won't take five to fit your little No. 2's with something nice."

Although she wore 5's she smiled and sat down to wait.

It Was a Sunday-School Melody.

"Pat McClure!"

"That's me, sir."

"Charged with disorderly conduct."

"How so, sir?"

"They complain that you alarm the neighborhood where you are working at carrying a hod at a new building."

"Yes, sir, I do sing; but it's a quiet Sunday-school melody, sir."

"What's that?"

"Still there's mor-tar follow."

Touching Her on a Tender Spot.

Magistrate—"The young lady says that your continued staring at her annoyed her excessively."

Prisoner—"I never intentionally annoyed a woman in my life, your honor."

Magistrate—"Then why did you stare at her so persistently?"

Prisoner—"Because she is pretty and I couldn't help it."

Young woman—"Let him go, Judge."

Natural That he Should.

"Mrs. Swellington Jones—Really, my dear, you owe it to your friends to get a new dress suit.

Mr. Swellington Jones—Well, if I do I shall have to owe it to my tailor.

The wick should be turned down until there is only a small flickering flame. Then a sharp puff of breath should be sent across the top of the chimney, not down it.

Moles may be removed by cautery, by excision, by caustics, by ligature, by electrolysis. Of all these methods, electrolysis is the best, because it leaves very little scar and causes comparatively little pain. Caustics cause the least pain and are easily applied, but their operation is tedious, and they are apt to stain and disfigure the skin.

Formula for camphor-balls, popularly regarded as a specific for "chaps" and abrasions: Spermaceti, two ounces; refined white wax, two ounces; almond-oil (sweet), a quarter of a pint. Melt by a gentle heat, and add camphor (in shavings) one ounce; stir until all are dissolved thoroughly and beginning to cool, then pour the mixture into slightly-warmed moulds or egg-cups. A drachm of balsam of Peru may be added while it is dissolving.

Mr. Thomas Andrews has carried out a long series of tests on pieces of iron and steel submerged at the mouths of rivers, where the fresh water began to mix with the salt water of the ocean. The tests have proved that in these circumstances the corrosion is from fifteen to fifty per cent. greater than when the article is submerged in pure ocean water. This increased action is attributed by Mr. Andrews to a galvanic action that is brought into play by the difference of potential caused by the mixture of the waters.

How To Drive.

To fit a horse for making a long journey successfully, and with safety to health, life, and limb, or to make a shorter distance speedily, and with like results, requires more skill and judgment than is ordinarily brought to bear in such cases. The National Live Stock Journal asserts that the feed should be clean oats to the limit of perfect digestion, with a moderate amount of bright hay, in no case sufficient to "fill the horse," because in that condition he can have neither speed nor bottom. As a rule, give no corn to a horse intended for other than slow work. The same rule should apply to what is termed "mill feed," except in the form of an occasional feed, the object being to loosen the bowels. The giving of such a mess, as a habit, should be avoided. On the road the horse should be driven moderately for the first hour or two, that full digestion may be completed upon anyfood within him. An observant man canmeasure the feelings and ability of the horse by his outward manifestations, and to spur a horse on that is usually ready to do his duty, but for the moment lags because of being under some physical inability that he cannot throw off, is both inhuman and unwise. If there is a journey of a day or more to make, the horse should be spared at the start, given a walk now and then, with an occasional full stop, and it will surprise most men to see how quickly he will regain his lost energies. The Arab maxim says, drive moderately until the horse has sweated and dried off three times, and after that you can let him go forward freely and he will not disappoint any reasonable expectations. If it is observed during the early part of a day's drive that the horse belches wind and alternately passes it also, it will be idle to expect any great performance until this condition passes off. In such a state the abdomen will usually be more or less distended, and no horse can give even a moderate display of his good qualities while in this state. While on the road for a journey the horse should be fed his principal meal at night, first giving him water. If the horse leaves a quart or so of his oats at the night feeding, he will rise from his night's rest at three or four o'clock and finish the feed. This is better than to give a full feed in the morning just before starting. The full night feed of oats will be digested and mainly assimilated by the time the morning start is made, and must be mainly relied upon to sustain the horse through the day. This is simply because digestion is interrupted and done at a great disadvantage while the horse is under active exercise, hence, to a degree, food becomes a burden while the horse is doing full duty. So, rightly fitted and discreetly managed on the road, the horse, reasonably well calculated for driving, will be up to the standard fixed by the poet:

"Courageous, light-mouthed and sure-footed."

Not a Family Man.

"Gimme a couple o' tickets fer the show," said a countryman at the box office.

"Yes, sir; for the family circle?"

"Sh!" warned the countryman, and then he whispered:

"No, not fer the family circle. You see I've only been married 'bout four hours, Mister. Jest put us in 'mong the young folks."

MEN AND WOMEN.

President Grevy employs his leisure hours in instructing his little grandchild, Marguerite Wilson, in reading, writing, and arithmetic. He is said to take this task very seriously. That Mlle. Marguerite does, probably goes without telling.

A newspaper was received the other day at the Boston Post Office, addressed "Mr. George H. Handel, care of the Handel and Haydn Society." Some thirty years ago there came to the Society a letter addressed, "Messrs. Handel and Hayden, musicians." It is not convenient to forward the paper.

During the famous Repeal and Emancipation agitations at Cork, the late Wm. Hayes, whose death, at the age of ninety-one, was announced in London, was a conspicuous figure. In 1826 he had a dispute with a Catholic lawyer named Brice, and shot him dead in a duel. Thereafter Mr. Hayes kept aloof from political matters, and devoted himself to religion and works of benevolence.

We observe the announcement of the decease of the aged Baroness de Forget (before he. marriage, Mlle. Josephine de Lavalette), who heroically effected her father's escape from the cells of those condemned to die in the Bonaparte struggle. The plan was concocted between herself and her mother, Mme. de Lavalette, after the same manner as Lord and Lady Nithesdale's in the Jacobite Rebellion.

A good story of clerical wit is revived in the papers lately, the anecdote of old Bishop Mountain, of Durham, whose apt quotation of a Scripture text elevated him to York. That archbishopric falling vacant, King George II asked his opinion as to the proper person for the office. Dr. Mountain wittily replied: "Hadst thou faith as a grain of mustard seed, thou wouldst say to this Mountain" (laying his hand upon his breast), "Be thou removed, and cast into the sea" (See). The king was so amused by the sally that he laughed heartily, and bestowed the preferment.

Lord Savernake, who has lately succeeded to the vast estates of the Earl of Aylesbury is probably the worst spendthrift in the ranks of the British peerage. He is twenty-three, receives over $250,000 per year; owns three of the most splendid country seats in the island; and is a marquis, thrice an earl, a viscount, twice a baron and a baronet. He drives a cab; presides at music halls; fights in the street like a butcher; has been twice in the police court this year for a street battle; is an accomplished sharper and married a variety singer of no character.

Mr. H. Rider Haggard, whose South African Romance, "King Solomon's Mines," achieved such a success, is a barrister by profession. At the age of 19—he is now only 30—he accompanied Sir H. Bulwer as secretary to Natal, and served on the staff of Sir Theophilus Shepstone during his mission to the Transvaal, and it was during the time he was at the Cape that he acquired the local knowledge which he has turned to good account. His first effort in literature was a history of events in South Africa, published in 1882 under the title of "Cetewayo and His White Neighbors."

Mr. J. C. Forbes, R. C. A., of Toronto, has just returned from a four months' trip to the Rockies, where he has been sketching with a view to putting on canvas some of the most characteristic scenery of that region. Mr. Forbes has been most successful, in the opinion of those on the spot, in depicting the grandeur of the mountains—notably the "Hermit" in the vicinity of Roger's Pass. In addition to several large canvases, Mr. Forbes will paint some dozen or so smaller ones, descriptive of life in British Columbia, forming on the whole a most interesting gallery for exhibition in the coming Spring, and for subsequent exhibition in England.

The latest London Canadian Gazette says: An interesting gathering took place at the Colonial Exhibition on Saturday evening, when, at the invitation of Mr. D. Tallerman, a dinner was given in the Royal Commission Dining Rooms to illustrate the food resources of the Empire. The bill of fare consisted of over thirty dishes, on which were salmon from British Columbia, shad from Prince Edward Island, mackerel from New Brunswick, cod and lobster from Nova Scotia; whitefish, trout, and pickerel from Lake Huron; Australian rabbits and Australian mutton and beef. Among the vegetables were Canadian beans. The sweets consisted of Fiji arrowroot puddings, Canadian farina pudding, tartlets and pastry of Canadian flour, and Canadian apple jelly. The fruits were pineapples from Singapore, Victorian pears, Victorian white cherries in syrup, and Canadian apples and pears. There were also Canadian cheese and butter and Western Australian and Canadian honey.

Roman London.

In A. D. 50 Cæsar founded Lundinium, or Augusta. Eleven years later the Britons revolted under Boadicea, sacked the town, massacred the inhabitants, and burned every building, and the limits of the discoveries of the ashes of this conflagration, coupled with the discovery of walls of too great a thickness to be those of ordinery buildings, seem to define the extent of the first Roman London as follows: The northern boundary, Cornhill and Leadenhall-street; the eastern, Billiter-street and Mark-lane; the western, the east side of Wallbrook, and the southern, of course, the river. Within these limits, and nowhere beyond, wherever pick and shovel have penetrated deep enough—that is, to an average depth of 18 feet below the present surface, charred remains and other evidences of intense heat have been found, and to Sir Christopher Wren, to whom the task was confided of rebuilding the city after the fire of 1666, is the credit due of having made the discovery that there was an embryo London previous to the comparatively big city of the later Roman dominion. Cannon-street was evidently the central point. In Bush-lane, in 1666, was discovered the remains of a very large building (probably a Basilica, or hall of justice) and the pavement of a house which, from its size, must have been the Governor's residence, both imbedded in a thick black layer of ashes and charred wood. About here the buildings appear to have been tolerably dense, for in digging for sewers in Queen-street, Scott's Yard, and Bush-lane in 1840, the workmen came upon innumerable walls of such solidity that they could not be destroyed; and, at the foot of Lambeth Hill, one 10 feet thick and 8 feet high, which might have been a fragment of the oldest London river wall. All this part of London was then marshy, for in Thames street, always a rich mine of Roman remains, we find that the buildings unearthed are almost invariably built upon stout oaken piles. The Wallbrook, too, like the Sherbourne and the Langbourne, must have been something more than a mere stream, for the timber supports of a fair-sized bridge have been discovered, and the causeway leading from it in the direction of what is now Princes street, consisting of big stones laid upon regular layers of earth and wattles supported by timber, as if a quay had run along the banks.

MURDERED EIGHT PERSONS.

The Poe Family Supposed to Have Been Killed by Their Neighbors.

It has been ascertained that the Poe family of eight persons, supposed to have been accidentally burned to death in Knox county, Tenn., a month ago, were murdered. Their throats were first cut from ear to ear. The family had two neighbors—John Worm and his paramour—who, on account of their reputation, were not permitted to enter Mr. Poe's house. These neighbors had an illegitimate child, a boy about 10 years old. They lived some thirty yards from Poe's house, and, becoming enraged because they were not socially recognized, they formed the design of murdering the entire family. The boy, suffering under a severe chastisement from his reputed father, now tells the whole story.

He says his mother was talking about the matter several days, and that it culminated during a night when Mr. Poe was absent from home. When his father and mother left home for Poe's house they forbade his going with them, but he slipped along without their knowledge and saw them enter the house. The family, all of whom were females, were asleep in one room. The boy's father with a razor cut the throat of each victim, while his mother picked the bodies up, placed them in the middle of the floor, piled the contents of two beds on them, and then set fire to them and the house. Mrs. Poe's little baby screamed until the smoke smothered it. The boy told his story in such a straightforward manner as to lead to an investigation.

The man and woman were at once arrested. A sewing machine, beds, and several other articles recognized as belonging to the murdered family were found beneath the house of the accused persons. They were at once placed in jail at Barbourfsille. No doubt of their guilt is entertained. The excitement is terrible, and it is likely the prisoners will be lynched.

Bulgarian Affairs.

At the close of the last war between Russia and Turkey, the Turkish province of Bulgaria, the sufferings of whose Christian inhabitants under their Mohammedan rulers had brought on the conflict, was made a self-governing state, not wholly independent of Turkey, but bound to her by slender ties. This was the work of England, Austria-Hungary, and the other Powers prompted by a desire to prevent Russia from again interfering in Bulgarian affairs, and so advancing toward the coveted city of Constantinople. Inasmuch as Bulgaria could not be trusted to maintain unaided her position against the Russians, it was agreed by the Berlin Treaty that all the European Powers should be, in a manner, protectors of the little state. Russia, however, has spared no means to secure the friendship of the Bulgarians, with but little success. The German—Alexander—who was chosen to rule this much-protected principality, won the affections of the people for himself, and so became distasteful to the czar, who is strongly suspected of being the cause of his downfall last August. However that may be, Alexander left the country amid the tears of his adopted subjects, and the agents of Russia set about canvassing for the new election.

The Berlin Treaty ordered that the Prince of Bulgaria shall be freely elected by the population and confirmed by the Sublime Porte (the Turkish imperial government), with the consent of the Powers. No member of any of the reigning houses of the great European Powers may be elected Prince of Bulgaria. It was the intention of the signers of the treaty to remove the government as far as possible from the influence of any single Power, such as Russia, England, or Austria-Hungary. The prince is chosen, not by the people directly, but by the Sobranje, a representative body. This body met at Tirnova, and after a week spent in discussion unanimously elected Prince Waldemar to fill the vacancy caused by Alexander's abdication. There was no outspoken opposition to this candidate, although it seemed to be regretfully understood that Waldemar would represent in some degree the unpopular Russian influence.

Prince Waldemar is the youngest child of King Christian IX. of Denmark. His sister, Alexandra, is the wife of the Prince of Wales, and his sister Maria is the wife of the Russian czar. It may be that it is to these relationships, together with the fact that his brother George is King of Greece, that Waldemar owed his election. His father, the Danish king, has advised the prince to decline the proffered honor, and Bulgaria has yet to look for a ruler. Russia does not admit that the Sobranje was legally chosen, and it is hardly probable that any one will accept the throne while Russia opposes the election.

He Couldn't Wind It.

A New York judge who was trying a man for robbing a woman of her gold watch as she was stepping on a horse-car did a neat piece of cross-examination. The man claimed that the watch was his and the woman was mistaken in identifying it as hers. Suddenly the judge asked, "Where's the key?" The prisoner fumbled in his pockets and said he must have left it at home. The judge asked him if he had wound the watch frequently with the key, and he said "yes." Then a key was procured, watch and key were handed the prisoner, and he was told to wind the watch. He opened the case but could not find any place to use the key, because the watch was a stemwinder. The sentence was five years and a half.

To polish glass and remove slight scratches rub the surface gently, first with a clean pad of fine cotton wool and afterward with a similar pad covered with cotton velvet which has been charged with fine rouge. The surface will, under this treatment, acquire a polish of great brilliancy, quite free from the presence of any scratches.

—The Dominion Elections is not now expected before next summer.

—The Prohibition sentiment is constantly growing throughout the Dominion, and we may reasonably look for a general Prohibitary liquor law in the near future.

BALANCE ACCOUNTS,

In every instance where it is possible credit accounts should be paid in full at or about the close of the year, and commence the new year with a "clean sheet." This might be done as well as not in numerous cases where from mere carelessness or neglect it is allowed to run from year to year, and probably end in a dispute: There are however numerous instances when full payment is impossible at the close of the year, and in all such cases there should be a balancing of accounts and an understanding between creditor and debtor as to the actual amount due, and the prospects of when and how it may be paid.

The credit system has been a boon to many when rightly used, but the ruination of thousands, chiefly through its abuse.

There are many, who after contracting a debt or running an account, and not being in a position to meet the indebtedness when due, will evade meeting his creditor, and even make his purchases in other establishments rather than come in contact with him who has favored him with goods on time.

Now this is as unsatisfactory as it is common, and every person who has been guilty of such ingratitude in the past would do well to turn over a new leaf the coming January.

By all means settle up at the end of the year; if not by payment in full, then strike a balanse and have a fair understanding: "short accounts make long friends."

MUNICIPAL.

Glenelg Municipal matters are not causing much excitment as yet. We understand Mr. Moffatt the present reeve is a candidate for re-election, and as far as we can judge, will be elected whether he has opposition or not. He has filled the position with credit to himself, and we believe general satisfaction to the ratepayers. There is rumors of Mr. Binnie opposing the reeve, and we would not expect any better common sense from him. Mr. McCuaig the present deputy-reeve will likely be a candidate for re-election, as also Messrs. Lamb and Williams. Mr. Lamb has had one] years experience, which will no doubt be a great help to him the coming year should he be elected; he is an honorable man and has, we believe, given general satisfaction.

It is said that J. A. McMillen will again seek election; we are not certain however.

Markdale is likely to have a man in the field, but there is nothing definite yet.

In Euphrasia the old council are likely to be re-elected, so rumor has it, however it will be a surprise if that township don't have an election, and a hot contest at that. We have heard the name of Thos. McAfee spoken as a probable candidate, for councillor. He would no doubt make a good representative.

Artemesia is quiet as yet; nothing new on the program.

Holland is considerably agitated in reference to the contest for reeve. Mr. Cameron the present reeve is to be opposed by Dr. Oldham of Chatsworth. The latter is making a vigurous effort so it is said.

TO THE ELECTORS OF THE SOUTH RIDING OF GREY.

GENTLEMEN,—Owing to the elections for the Legislature being sprung upon us very unexpectedly I regret exceedingly that I have been unable to visit several portions of the riding. It was my intention to call a series of meetings before the next session commenced and consult with youlas to your views respecting the Franchise Bill, the excessive expenditure incurred in erection of new Parliament buildings and other important matters. I desire to briefly place my views and general policy before you, but shall endeavor to meet you at ever y possible point.

Elected as I was by the farming and laboring community, I challenge my opponents to point to one vote opposed to their interest.

As a Conserative I shall support that party on its general principles, believing the policy of the opposition under the leadership of Mr. Meredith to be more progressive and liberal than the legislation of the present government.

The laws introduced instead of being such as everyone could easily understand are only calculated to increase litigation, a very undesirable thing for an Agricultural Province.

I am a strong advocate for manhood suffrage and shall endeavor to do away with intricacies in the voters' lists by its introduction. I am opposed to any appropriation for Immigration purposes by the Provincial Legislatures.

The timber policy of the present government is open to censure, owing to large blocks being disposed of, to the disadvantage of those whose means would admit of them purchasing smaller areas.

The municipal legislation I consider is calculated to take power out of the hands of thepeople wh ich is legitimately theirs.

The time has now arrived when the intelligence of the people demands that greater powers should be conferred on both townships and country councils and by so doing the number of representatives in the Local Legislature instead of being increased as lately done, might be greately reduced.

I also belive that the Educational department should be under the control of a non-political head.

I am also strongly opposed to the monoply which now exists regarding the publication of our school books, and be'ieve that by allowing competition, the cost of the books, to the public would be materially lessened, and by less frequent changes a greater saving would accrue to parents.

I also venture to hope that the course I pursue in connection with the Land Improvement fund was in the interest of my constituents and in the future should you do me the honor to re-elect me, it shall be my utmost endeavor to look after the interest of those whom I represent.

There are many matters to which it is impossible to allude in an address, but while I am sensible of the honor you did me, a common farmer, by returning me as your representative I trust my course in the House has been such, as to retain your esteem and confidence.

Asking you for a renewal of your confidence.

I am gentlemen,
faithfully yours,
JOHN BLYTH.

To the Editor of the STANDARD.

DEAR SIR,—While reading the Dr's. reply to Mr. Elliott, he says "every member cried shame at the unreasonable expenditure" viz: $150 on Freemans hill, benefiting some 18 persons in Artemesia; I wonder where those members are now that they do not all "cry shame" at a more unreasonable and unecessary expenditure, and only accommodating about six persons in Artemesia. I refer to the Valley road which has cost this Municipality about $700 and they have not the title to one foot of it yet, and that amount will simply chop the road and level 12 foot; it will require bridges culverts and in many places ditching and gravelling before it is passible, and we learn they are not through surveying it yet, though the Council Aid Survey and pass a By-law to establish from Mr. Hogg's mill to Campbells deviation, and also notified the parties owning the land to remove the timber, and who, when at much inconveniance and loss had removed some 40 rods through a cedar swamp letting in air and possible fire, when waiting on the council for renumeration was told by the man who says he is "bound to sustain and vendicate his character at hazard" that he did not notify them to remove the timber (lift your thumb again Creasor) well if not Dr. Christoe, Reeve, this time it is Wm. Bellamy, Clerk. But it seems they do not want that portion of the road now and will throw it up in that dishonorable way and are commencing some 80 rods from Campbells deviation and running obliquely up the mountain some 80 rods from the bottom of the Valley where no four sane man in the Tow'p would think of making it. Was the Dr. Reeve when the first Survey was made? Had he a resolution of council to Survey from Hogg's mill to Campbells deviation when he did? Would it not have been cheaper to have brought out the 5 or 6 parties it will accomodate or the whole Valley at the origin l price? or perhaps cheaper still an Apothecary shop at Eschertion.

A RATEPAYER.

TO THE ELECTORS —OF THE— Centre Riding of Grey.

GENTLEMEN:—

The writs for a General Election for the Local Legislature will be issued immediately.

On Tuesday the 21st day of December next, the nominations are to be made and Tuesday the 28th day of December fixed for polling.

Having received the unanimous nomination of the largest and most influential Conservative Convention ever held in the Riding, which met in October last, and having since received the most encouraging assurance, of support from the electors generally, I beg most respectfully to announce that I feel it my duty to accede to their wishes and accept such nomination.

I have been a resident of the Riding for thirty-eight years. During the greater part of that period I have been, more or less, actively engaged in the administration of your municipal affairs and while occupying prominent positions of trust in your County Council I have invariably been guided by a desire to protect and promote your interests.

My long residence in the Riding and practical knowledge of the working of our municipal institutions enable me the more readily to anticipate your special requirements, represent your grievances and obtain relief from oppressive legislation. If elected as your representative, I will endeavor faithfully to discharge my duty by giving effect to wholesome legislation and will advocate a more economical administration of the finances and of the Crown domain. As there is not space in a short address to fully explain my views I shall endeavor to attend meetings in the various Townships of the Riding before the elections and there discuss in detail the various questions now before the people.

In conclusion, I shall advocate equal rights and privileges to all classes and creeds of Her Majesty's subjects. Being a resident of the Riding and like many of yourselves engaged in farming operations, our interests are identical I shall do my best to advance them.

Relying on your cordial and generous support to elect me as your representative

I have the honor to be,
Gentlemen,
Your obedient servant,
JOSEPH RORKE.

To the free and independent Electors of Centre Grey.

GENTLEMEN:—The time is at hand when you will be called upon to exercise your franchise in the selection of a representative to the Legislative Assembly of Ontario. The duty which you owe to your country, to yourselves and to posterity demands that you exercise that privelege with a calm and settled determination to advance the best interests of our fair Province. In the heat of party strife men of impulsive temperaments are apt to overlook the realissues involved in the living present, and to allow their judgments to become warped by the mere shiboleths of the dead past. The interests of our country, the advancement of intelligence and the humanizing influence of our common Christianity demand that we lay aside the religious strifes and party contentions which have so long disturbed and distracted the National mind, and that as sons of our common country, loyal subjects of our beloved Queen, we go "hand-in-hand" together; mutually intent upon the achievement of a higher civilization, a purer morality and a more liberal christian sentiment, and while firmly maintaining our own rights, yet willing to grant the same privileges which we claim for ourselves to those of our fellow countrymen who may differ from us in creed or nationality.

With the view of giving effect to these sentiments, I beg to announce that I am a candidate for your suffrages at the coming election, and I respectfully request that all my fellow electors who share these sentiments, will by their vote and influence do what they can to secure my election.

It is proper that you should ask, and it is right that I should declare, what my opinions are in reference to the issues which divide the "Parties" in Ontario at the present time.

In the main I am in accord with the general course of legislation pursued and with the principles enunciated and carried out for some years by the Mowat administration, and if elected I shall deem it my duty in the interests of the Province to sustain the present Government; reserving of course to myself the right to judge of each measure which may be brought forward, upon its merits, irrespective of the source from which it may emanate.

I am free to admit that with all Governments there is a tendency to unnecessary extravagance—against all such tendencies I shall deem it my duty as your representative to raise my voice and exert my influence.

In reference to the school law generally, my opinion is that recent legislation has been largely in the interest of the teaching profession, and that the interests of the public which ought to be paramount, have to a certain extent been ignored.

I am of opinion that the present 'holiday' terms are too long, especially to meet the requirements of rural communities, and that some change is desirable in this respect.

Of the many important questions which claim attention at this particular juncture it is impossible within the compass of a short address to speak with intelligence and precision:

During the canvass however I purpose to discuss some of these with you at the public meetings to be held at central points throughout the constituency when I hope to have the pleasure of meeting many of you and forming acquaintances which I trust will be mutually agreeable and lasting.

I have the honor to be,
GENTLEMEN,
Your obediant Servant,
WM. BROWN.

MARRIAGES.

On Nov. 30th, at the residence of the bride's father, by the Rev. A. Wilson, Mr. Robert Rabbitt, to Miss Grace Noble, all of Artemesia.

West's Cough Syrup, a certain and speedy cure for coughs, colds, and all throat and lung diseases.

West's Cough Syrup, the most reliable remedy for all throat and lung diseases. For safety keep it always in the house. All druggists.

Mr Editor.—Were it not for the palpable falsehoods contained in the reply of "Artemesias' Chief Officer," to my article in your paper, further notice of the matter would be unnecessary; he charges me with having insidental accomplices, and says the "Union Standard" of Thornbury and Bob Myles, appealed to me for advice. Both these statements are untrue—I challenge Dr. Christoe to prove the contrary.

Again he says the notorious letter was addressed to A. Elliott only, one councillor to another. This statement is also untrue. The address on the Envelope was A. Elliott Dep. Reeve. The latter itself had neither address nor date. It began "Since council day, and more particularly since yesterday, I think I was a little too mistrustful of Euphrasia." The Dr, says he (at the council board) explained thoroughly regarding the letter, I read the letter at the council board, and the thorough explanation spoken of consisted in the Reeve's "objecting to its being read, on the grounds that the letter was private. I held that the letter was a public letter and I have no recollection that any member of the council except the Dr, expressed an opinion to the contrary. The Reeve didn't tell the council of the magic effect. the sweet persuading words of Markdale's prominent inhabitant had upon his mind. A thorough explanation is just the point the Dr. kept away from then, and will not touch now if he can avoid it.

The Dr. says I went for repudiation as well as the rest of the council. This statement is untrue and he must know it. When the bill was presented, I made a motion for payment, the Dr. read that motion, and asked me if I would press it to a vote. I knew and Dr. Christoe knew just as well, that the motion would have been lost on a division. I admit that I made a mistake in not insisting on the vote, but it does not prove repudation. And the reeve is taking an unair advantage; when he argues that, because he motion does not appear on the minute book no motion was made. But to get himself out of a difficulty, he has since taken a similar position with Mr. Hogg, Re. Valley deviation.

The most extraordinary part of the Dr's. letter is the shameless admission that he swore that he did not sign the letter as Reeve and his attempt to get out of the difficulty by saying that "I wilfully suppressed the fact that the mistake was rectified as soon as made and the letter acknowledged in its entirety." The Dr. made no correction, neither was the letter acknowledged in its entirety. There was no such fact to suppress.

The Dr. appears to think if I had given the Judge's ruling it would have exonerated him from blame. I did give the ruling briefly. If he is not satisfied, he can get a certified copy from the clerk of the court, by paying for it, and I have no objection to its publication.

But the Dr's. experience before the court is not a very happy one, In the case of Sullivan against Artemesia, he met with a rebuff. and to screen himself, first charged the Judge with partiality, then because the Jury was residents of Markdale and vicinity, they gave a verdict against the Township, and to make himself absolutely safe he shifted the responsibility a third time and placed it on the shoulders of the council. So much for the Drs' reliability.

The Reeve of Collingwood asked for a grant of $100 from the county of Grey. As an equivalent to a similar grant made by Simcoe to improve the county line between Thornbury and the lake; on two occasions the Dr. spoke and voted against the grant, but when it was introduced the third time, and the amount swelled to $400. by the introduction of three other grants of a similar kind he got up in his place in the County Council and said, Mr. Warden and gentemen. I have read the statute and taken legal advice on this matter, I am going to vote for the amendment, I know I am wrnog but I wont do so again. Was that an honest vote. The Dr. poses as a Temperance advocate, and has used his influence with his neighbor to take out a Hotel licence, and became his securety by signing his bonds. "Consistency thou art a jewel."

He says I am unable to point my finger at any Municipal irregularity or default; Was there no irregularity in the Reeve without authority of council sanctioning survey of valley road from Hogg's property to Duncan Campbells, at a cost, for survey plans &c of some $50 or $60?

Is it not an irregularity for the Reeve to urge, and by sharp practice secure, the expenditure of $600 or $700 on valley deviation before the right of way has been purchased or even properly located? Surely if the council cried shame at the unreasonable expenditure of $150 on Nelson's hill, they will raise their hands and fall back in Holy horror, as did Saul before the ghost of Samuel, at this unbusiness-like expenditure of public money.

The above are only a few of the many irregularities I might notice. I leave them with the ratepayers for their consideration, I may refer to the subject again.

The Dr's object just now appeares to be to obtain the sympathy of his constituents, but he is not so particular about the means he uses, as the attainment of his purpose. He appears to think that my ambition for years

Dried Potatoes.

An American gentleman residing in France writes: "Potato culture is likely to receive a new impetus since the plan of selling them peeled, sliced and dried, like certain fruits, seems to hit the taste of the export market. The drying the potatoes can follow the period of the dessication of fruits. The method obviates decay and germination of the tuber, and occupying a less volume, transport will be cheaper and less difficult. The potatoes are peeled by machinery, next carefully washed, sliced in rounds, and left for twenty minutes in a strong solution of kitchen salt. The brine induces firmness in the slices and prevents their changing color. Later the cuttings are drained, placed in the drying apparatus, packed in boxes and are then ready for shipment.

Remember that the selection of seed is an important factor in the next year's crop.

Rotten corn cobs are said to be a valuable fertilizer on any soil that is deficient in potash, and their value is much enhanced by being rotted with other manure.

Fruit that cannot be sold may be dried, evaporated, made into cider for vinegar or jelly. In this manufactured form it can be kept as long as necessary and sold when a fair price can be secured.

If a manger or feed box be so foul as to emit a sour smell it should be cleansed at once. The best method of doing so is by washing it thoroughly with a solution of soda or potash in hot water, flushing afterwards with hot water only.

The intense itching caused by poison ivy may be relieved almost immediately by bathing the parts with the following: Bromo-chloralum, four ounces; wine of opium, two ounces; water, six ounces. These articles may be had at any drug store.

More butter will be obtained if the cream from the last one or two messes is kept back each time. It has not ripened with the other, and all its butter cannot be obtained. The danger of having milk become bitter in small dairies is obviated by stirring in a little once a day until enough is left for churning.

If a farmer wishes to educate his boys that they may become good and contented followers of his own calling, his first step should be to educate himself. In order that he may make successful farmers of them he must himself have a just understanding of the possibilities of his vocation, and a genuine love for farm work.

The Lassie's Secret.

BY ARCHIE MACK.

When evening dews are falling
At close of summer's day,
When twilight droops her mantle,
I hasten quick away,
To meet beneath the shadows
My lover brave and true,
To listen to his whisper
Sweeter than honey'd dew.

If you but knew my Willie
You'd wonder then no more
Why I'm so gay and happy,
For him I do adore.
And in return, he loves me,
So fondly and so true,
And every night he meets me
When falls the evening dew.

We whisper low our secrets,
The birds e'en cannot hear
The honey'd words my Willie
Breathes in my listening ear.
Nor yet my low responses
Beneath the willow tree,
As with his fond carresses
He vows his love for me.

Some say my Willie's handsome,
Some say my Willie's plain,
Some say it for to please me
And some to give me pain.
I know how kind and gentle
His dark eyes grow to be,
When in the starry twilight
He breathes his love to me.

I know how sweet and low is
His voice at close of day,
When turned with man's affection
He pours love's gentle lay.
He seems to me so handsome,
So grand, so brave, and true,
At morning dawn, and noontide,
And 'neath the falling dew.

BY NORA LAUGHER.

When the maples move in the winter breeze
And the snowflakes lie neath the leafless trees
In a bright Canadian street
I hear the sparrows greet
Each other cheerily,
Always cheerily!
What, what little bird,
What was it I heard?
Tut, tut,
Cheer up, cheer up
Never wearily!

And the little boys and the little girls
With their fur capped heads and their hooded curls
In the pleasant, winter day
Happily engaged in play,
Oh, no, never wearily,
Always cheerily!
Well, well, little girl
With the golden curl,
Tut, tut,
Cheer up, cheer up
Never wearily!

LATE DOMINION NEWS.

Another attempt has been made to start an incendiary fire at Calgary.

Woodstock High School has been raised to the rank of a Collegiate Institute.

Twelve thousand barrels of apples were shipped from Halifax for London in one vessel on Thursday last.

There died in Sheffield Township a few days ago Mrs. Mary Williams, aged 100 years 5 months and 5 days.

The sowing of wild rice on the inland lakes of Bruce county is being the means of stocking them with wild geese and ducks.

During last week over one hundred thousand bushels of potatoes were shipped from the little port of Montague, on Prince Edward Island.

Fifteen bears, averaging in weight three hundred pounds each, have been killed by farmers in the township of Plummer within the past month.

The dead body of a well dressed man was found at Sharonigad Lake, B. C., recently, sitting in an upright position, with a pistol lying on the ground beside it.

A dog with a great mouth for pastry got into the window of a Peterboro' confectionery and bakery one day last week and before he could be ejected had devoured and destroyed several dollars' worth of cakes and candy.

On Thursday of last week John W. Roscoe, an aged and wealty farmer of Kings County, N. S., got into an altercation with his son-in-law, Trueman Thorpe, regarding Thorpe's treatment of his wife. A personal encounter followed, from the effects of which Roscoe died. Thorpe has fled to the United States.

A tramp got on the Air Line Railroad track near Simcoe, waved his hands, and stopped an express train. When asked by the conductor why he had stopped the train he replied that he had done it for a joke. He was arrested, tried, and given three months to work out the joke to its legitimate conclusion.

According to the St. Stephen, N. B., Courier, a large number of the operatives brought there from Europe last summer by the St. Croix Cotton Mill, have left, as they were not considered desirable help or citizens. Several grocers and other dealers hold unpaid bills against some of the absentees.

The Battleford Herald pleasantly observes:—The weather continues most delightful. The days are bright and warm, the nights so free from frost that the rivers are not yet closed. We feel sorry for those who returned to the fogs and muck of Ontario a couple of months ago through fear that winter was about to set in. They have no such weather in Ontario as we are enjoying.

The St. John, N. B., Telegraph recently published a report of an entertainment alleged to have taken place in the Moncton Opera House, which turns out to have been a scandalous fabrication. The names of prominent citizens were placed side by side with the most disreputable characters of the town as having participated in the entertainment. The Telegraph will spare no pains to discover the author of the malicious and rascally report.

Mr. James Bradburn, formerly of Dereham, who recently returned from Little Curren, Manitoulin Island, brought a very large specimen of Canada's national emblem—a maple leaf measuring 12¾ inches long by 12 inches wide. He plucked the leaf from a tree on Manitoulin Island from among many more equally as large. He says these great leaves—giants in comparison with those we are used to seeing in this portion of Ontario—are no uncommon thing in the Muskoka district.

The other morning James Beharrel, of Lorneville, N. S., left Amherst Head to look out timber in a large tract of woods. Not returning at night a party was organized to search for him. During the whole night the woods were scoured, guns fired, and horns blown, and on the following day another party was sent out and the search continued, but without success. As Mr. Beharrel had a gun with him it is feared he has been accidentally shot, fallen into a moose snare, or become the prey of bears.

A young lady named Beal, of Prince Edward Island, has just been sent to Boston for treatment for insanity. The circumstances of the case are very sad. Last summer the brother of Miss Beal was suspected of being one of the two men who wantonly shot a youth while driving along one of the highways in the Island. The officers of the law followed young Beal to his home, and there arrested him in the presence of his sister. Tht girl was so stunned by the arrest and trial of her brother that from that time to the present day she has been out of her mind. Her brother, who was accused of the crime, was tried and acquitted.

Remember This.

Dr. R. Couetoux, of France, reports two cases, aged six and nine years of diphtheria. When death was apparently imminent, and treacheotomy had been refused as a last resort he ordered inhalations of steam, tinctured with cubebs, of which twenty-five grammes were placed in the boiler at once, and the steam being conveyed by tubes to the beds of the children to be inhaled by them. Both made a good recovery. Dr. Couetoux says that cubebs used in this way against the diphtheria is more powerful than eucalyptus, glycerine, tar, or the essence of terebinthina.

Quite the Proper Thing.

"Did you hear that Isaacs, the pawnbroker, had recently been presented with triplets?" said Sam Sample.

"No," replied Peabody Jamieson. "But it is quite the proper thing."

"Why was it?"

"Three bawls, you know."

Like Lightning.

The rapid action of the "great pain cure," Polson's Nerviline, in relieving the most intense pain, is a matter of wonder to all who have used it. There is nothing surprising in its results, for it is made of the strongest, purest and most efficient remedies known in medicine. Nerviline cures toothache instantly; cramps in five minutes; neuralgia after two applications; rheumatism is at once relieved by its use; and the same may be said of all kinds of pain. Sample bottles, costing only 10 cts. at any drug store. The large bottle only 25 cents. Polson's Nerviline sold by druggists and country dealers.

The Beauty of Woman

is her crown of glory. But alas! how quickly does the nervous debility and chronic weakness of the sex cause the bloom of youth to pass away, sharpen the lovely features, and emaciate the rounded form! There is but one remedy which will restore the faded roses and bring back the grace of youth. It is Dr. Pierce's "Favorite Prescription," a sovereign remedy for the diseases peculiar to females. It is one of the greatest boons ever conferred upon the human race, for it preserves that which is fairest and dearest to all mankind—the beauty and the health of woman.

"See here, Tom, it looks as if you were trying to cultivate the Widow Balsted." "Well, Charlie, to tell the truth, I am trying to rid her of weeds."

To Consumptives.

Reader can you believe that the Creator afflicts one-third of mankind with a disease for which there is no remedy? Dr. R. V. Pierce's "Golden Medical Discovery" has cured hundreds of cases of consumption, and men are living to-day—healthy, robust men—whom physicians pronounced incurable, because one lung was almost gone. Catarrh, Catarrhal Deafness and Hay Fever.

Sufferers are not generally aware that these diseases are contagious, or that they are due to the presence of living parasites in the lining membrane of the nose and eustachian tubes. Microscopic research, however, has proved this to be a fact, and the result is that a simple remedy has been formulated whereby catarrh, catarrhal deafness and hay fever are cured in from one to three simple applications made at home. A pamphlet explaining this new treatment is sent free on receipt of stamp by A. H. Dixon & Son, 308 King Street West, Toronto, Canada.

CHAPTER XV.—(CONTINUED.)

"You are a good sort of dear, you are," said Joseph, in a contemplative tone, as though reflecting aloud.

"You will take care that Mrs. Wagner don't know that I ever go, Joseph; because, if you and Tom did not help me I could not do so, you know."

"All's right, Miss Grace—all's right. I only hopes that if I am ever laid up in ordinary, like poor old Jabes Hutchins, miss, some good angel, as like you as possible, will look after me a bit."

"I will, Joseph."

"Lord bless you, miss! you will be a grown up lady by then, and be getting married."

"Oh, no—no! I mean to stay with Gerald all my life, Joseph."

"Well, miss, that's as it may be; but you was a-going to tell me something."

"Yes, I did not see Hutchins, but at the door of his hut a gentleman met me, and took the basket from me, and while I was talking to him I saw a green rocket and made sure the Rift was close in, so I ran off at once and made Tom row back."

"Well, miss, it was all right enough about the rocket, and the Rifs is coming in, but she is beating on and off a little, for some reason or another. That's all you see, my dear Miss Grace. Captain Dolan has a reason for all that, you may depend; but the Rift will soon be in, I take it, and then you will see Gerald again, poor lad."

"Yes, yes," sighed Grace. "I will hope that. You do not think, Joseph, that there has really been a battle?"

"I don't know; but I will own that it looks like it."

"But—but—"

"What is it, miss?"

"Nobody would think of hurting Gerald?" Joseph shook his head.

"Bullets and shot, my dear, don't much mind who is in their way; but there may be a good many shots fired at such a little scudding vessel as our cutter and not one hit her."

"Yes! Oh, yes! And so she has escaped?"

"I hope so."

"Oh, dear! Oh, dear!"

"Now, what makes you sigh in that sort of way, miss?"

"I was thinking—"

"About what?"

"That gentleman I saw at the door of Hutchins' cottage. And it was so strange, too, Joseph, that after Tom had rowed the punt quite round the rocks, I thought I heard some one call out my name."

"What name, miss?"

"Grace! Grace!"

"Well, that's odd; but you see it couldn't be, so there ain't no sort of good in worrying about it. There we are—there we are."

Another rocket at this moment came high into the air and, as the others had done, sent down its shower of green fire.

"Now, miss, the Rift will soon be in and Captain Dolan will expect to find the cliff open."

"Yes—yes," sighed Grace. "Oh, that gentleman, it seems as if I could lie upon his breast and go to rest so sweetly and so safely. But I shall see Gerald now—my own dear brother, Gerald! Oh, Joseph, he must not be made go again on board the Rift."

"Hush, hush! I will speak to you about that another time, Miss Grace."

"Oh, you will, will you?" muttered a female voice from some dozen paces distant, down a rugged staircase in the body of the cliff. "Dolan shall hear of this!"

The voice was the property of Mrs. Wagner, a woman of half Dutch and half German descent, and who had been the housekeeper) if the expression may be used in regard to the cavernous house of the smuggler) to Dolan for the past five years, and who was deeply in his confidence.

Mrs. Wagner now stepped forward, saying as she advanced:

"Come, Grace, it is high time for you to retire!"

"No—no!"

"No! But I say yes!"

"No, Mrs. Wagner; I ventured to stay up to see my brother Gerald come back."

"Your brother Gerald!" sneered Mrs. Wagner. "A pretty brother, indeed, who used to be carried on board his own father's ship!"

"Gerald does not want to be a smuggler!"

"Oh, dear, no! That is too good for any gentleman; but perhaps he will have to be something worse if he does not get cut off in the prime of his days!"

"What do you mean, Mrs. Wagner?"

"Just what I say, and neither more nor less: so come in at once, will you?"

"No, Mrs. Wagner!"

"No?"

"Certainly not. I intend to stay here and see the Rift come in."

"Then you won't!"

Mrs. Wagner made a movement to take Grace by the arm and force her away; but the young girl stepped up close to Joseph as she said:

"Protect me; I will not go!"

"Avast, there, Mrs. Wagner!" said Joseph. "Can't you let the young thing alone?"

"You mind your own business or perhaps I can say a something to Captain Dolan that you won't like."

"Well, then, Mrs. Wagner, since you say so much you can just go and say and do your worst, and I won't have the young thing interfered with. I don't care about your Captain Dolan. What is he to me, or any of us? We all row in the same boat. He's a smuggler and so are we, only the craft happens to be his, so we go out with him; but he has no more power or right to say to me or any of us: Do this or do that than we have to him."

"This is mutiny!"

Joseph laughed.

"You stay here Miss Grace, and you shall see the Rift come in, whether Mrs. Wagner likes it or not."

"I will—I will! Oh! thank you, Joseph!"

"Very well," said Mrs. Wagner, in a tone of suppressed rage—"very well, you will settle that with Captain Dolan!"

"Ay, ay!" cried Joseph. "And there's the Rift!"

Plainly now visible from the cliffs was the Rift, about half a mile from the shore, and apparently heaving to, while in the offing, and, so to speak, shutting the Rift up in the bay, was the Spray.

This was the position which these two vessels held at the commencement of our narrative, and which it has been our duty to follow them to, through the many adventures and hair breadth escapes of the smuggler and pirate.

We shall now see how it was that the Rift so mysteriously disappeared before the eyes of the astonished officers and crew of the Spray.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE CAVERN IN THE CLIFF—THE RIFT DISAPPEARS IN SMOKE.

To all appearance, the Rift was slowly drifting either straight to the beach or right on to the cliffs that rose so abruptly from it.

Abutting out into the bay some couple of hundred yards was a huge mass of cliff of about a quarter of a mile in total width, although irregular in its surface and presenting every possible variety of indentation and jagged outline that a chalk mass is susceptible of. So far did the greater portion of this cliff extend into the bay that the lowest tide still left a good depth of water laving its base; and when the sea ran high, the waves roared and lashed themselves to fury up the stormbeaten natural battlement.

The rains of ages had dashed upon the face of the cliff; and from above there had poured in long, devious rivulets, little rills of water, bringing with them various dyes from the scanty soil on the cliff-top, so that the face of the rock next the sea presented not only a most disorganized mass in regard to shape, but almost every possible color in the way of paint-stains that could be found in the earths above.

It was right on this chalky mass that the Rift seemed drifting to her own destruction.

Apparently commencing at the surface of the sea, but in reality going deep down into the chalk formation, there had been an open cavern—a sort of cleft in the cliff of about fifty feet in height from the sea-level at half-tide and some forty or more feet in width. Into this cavern the waves had been in the habit of dashing with a wild fury that would have appalled any persons who might have been seized with a desire to penetrate its depths; but yet, it was evident that there had been persons adventurous enough for the purpose, and but that there were some special circumstances that made that particular portion of the cliff avoided, no doubt the cavern would have been much better known than it was.

The cliff above was undercut to such a depth that a notion had taken possession of the country people and fishermen that it was dangerous and would come down in a mass some day; and this being represented to the lord of the manor, whose jurisdiction extended to the verge, he had put up a railing and a warning—which, for a considerable distance inland, kept people from approaching the cliff's verge.

All this helped Dolan and his crew.

It was many years before the time of which we write that he had thoroughly explored the cavern and found out, no doubt, its great capabilities as a refuge for a small smuggling vessel. But that was not sufficient.

Not only was the cavern to be adopted as a refuge for so small a vessel as the cutter—if hard pressed by any pursuit in the Channel—but some means must be adopted by which the character of the refuge should be unsuspected entirely. This was accomplished ingeniously and successfully.

Several old mainsails were procured by Dolan, which, when sewn together, were sufficiently large to cover up the whole entrance to the sea-cavern. By strong eyebolts fastened deeply in the cliff, and some cordage, this canvas covering to the cavern could at any time be made secure or unshipped at pleasure. It was well daubed with chalk, and the stains of the Winter rains upon it assimilated it to the color of the cliff most exactly. It wrapped itself round the projections and fell into the hollows; and at half a mile distant, no one could possibly—unless specially informed that there was something to discover—have detected this canvas covering from solid cliff.

It was by the firing of her guns at the Spray for some few minutes, and by the smoke made by the Spray in answering that firing, that the Rift got up sufficient obscurity on the night in question to enable her to slip into the cavern and have the canvas covering replaced again securely.

All was darkness in this home in the solid cliff, with the one exception of a gleam of light in day-time that straggled down through a hidden opening about half way up and toward which rude steps had been made.

This served for ventilation to the cavern.

It was on the little plateau on the face of the cliff at the top of these steps that Joseph and Grace had stood during the progress of the talk they had together, and it was upon these rude steps that Mrs. Wagner had come to order Grace to retire for the night.

A couple of the crew of the Rift were always kept at home in the cavern to manage the canvas covering; and when the green rocket was reported as having been seen in the offing, it was the understood signal that the Rift was coming for shelter.

And so, amid the smother of the smoke from her own guns and from those of the Spray, the Rift disappeared bodily from before the astonished eyes of the officers and crew of the government vessel.

Slowly did the last remnants of the smoke curl up over the brow of the cliff, and sweetly now did the moon look down upon the waters of the little bay.

With slackened sails and beating off and on with a heaving, restless motion, the Spray slowly drifted into the bay.

Surprise, not unmingled with a superstitious feeling, sat upon the countenances of the crew of the Spray.

There was, indeed, a look of no small consternation on the weather-beaten countenance of Mr. Royle, and it was some few moments before he spoke to the lieutenant, Mr. Green, who was by his side, and who had only by strong swimming saved himself when the Spray's boat was swamped by the anvil Ben Lovelace had flung into it from the deck of the Rift.

"Have I lost my eyesight, sir?" he said; "or is it true and real that the chase is gone?"

"Gone, indeed," said Mr. Green, with a strangely puzzled look.

"But she was there."

"She was—yes, she was there!"

The crew of the Spray had gathered to the port bow, which lay toward the shore, and in silence gazed into the waters of the bay, which sparkled now in the moonbeams, and looked calm and placid—land-locked as they were to so considerable an extent.

It appeared to them as if she had run into the bay, not with the object of avoiding capture—for that was too absurd—but to land her crew, and the fixed opinion of every seaman on board the Spray was that they would just have to take possession of the Rift, which would be abandoned, and that a shore hunt would have to be made for the crew and for Captain Dolan, her commander and owner.

Hence it was that when the smoke disappeared and they saw nothing but sea and cliff they were both disappointed and astonished.

"Mr. Royle," said Lieutenant Green, "he has sunk his vessel."

"I don't know, sir."

"What else can have happend?"

"Well, Mr. Green, I never did till now give way to these ideas."

"What ideas?"

"About phantom ships, sir, and those sort of things; but if it be possible that a phantom ship show itself on the blue water I should say that was one with whom we had a running fight for the last six hours."

"Pho—pho!"

"It's all very well to say 'pho—pho,' sir. but where is she?"

"At the bottom of the bay."

Mr. Royle shook his head in evident incredulity on that point, and it was equally evident from the strange and anxious manner of Lieutenant Green that he did not feel quite at his ease on the subject. After a further pause of some few moments he said:

"We have a boat left, I fancy."

"Ay, ay, sir; but it is the small one."

"Never mind; let her be launched and manned. I will go myself to see what I can of this mystery."

Mr. Royle gave the order and in a few moments the only remaining boat of the schooner—which was a small one that would not conveniently hold more than four rowers—was dancing on the waves by the side of the Spray.

Lieutenant Green leaped into his place and took the tiller-ropes in his hand, as he said:

"Pull in, my men."

With slow strokes, the four sailors pulled into the bay; and then one who had grown gray in the service, and who was always put forward as spokesman when anything had to be said to the officers, gave a pull to the grizzled locks of hair that hung beneath his hat and said:

"I beg your honor's pardon."

"What is it, Joe?"

"May I be so bold, your honor, as to make a hobservation to your honor?"

"Yes, yes; what is it?"

"Why, then, your honor, it ain't lucky."

"What is not lucky?"

"To pull in after the craft as has gone up into the air away yonder. Lor' bless your honor, I've been to sea, man and boy, a matter o' forty-nine year, and I ought to know, by this here time, what's lucky and what is not."

The other sailors looked at each other and nodded, as though they would intimate their opinion of the incontrovertible character of the argument or hobservation just made by old Joe.

The lieutenant smiled.

"So, Joe, you really believe we have come across the Flying Dutchman?"

"No, your honor—no; because your honor sees, as we have all heard of him, and his was a square-rigged vessel, and not a bit of a cutter like this, as we have been bowling along after ever so long. It isn't the Flying Dutchman, but it's one o' the same sort."

The men pulled so lazily at their oars while this little dialogue was in progress, that it was evident they calculated upon some impression being made upon Lieutenant Green's mind, so as to induce him to discontinue the expedition.

In that they were much mistaken.

"Well, Joe," he said, "is that all?"

"No, your honor, I rather thinks, if we goes on in this moonbeam, and gets to where we last saw the cutter, we shall come to a bad end."

"Very good, now: I rather think, if you don't all of you pull with a will, I shall report every one of you as soon as I get back to the Spray."

This threat had its desired effect; for if it pointed to nothing else, it certainly did to certain very uncomfortable stoppages of grog—which was not to be thought of with any degree of calmness.

So the boat from the Spray shot through the water; and although the men tried to keep it as clear of the ray of moonlight as they could, Mr. Green most provokingly would steer into it: and old Joe kept up a perpetual shaking of his head, as a kind of continual protest at the foolhardy character of the lieutenant's proceedings.

And so the boat made its way, until it was about a hundred and fifty yards from the cliffs, and evidently as near as possible over the spot on which the Rift had been last seen.

The lieutenant made a sign with his hand, and the men rested on their oars, only now and then giving a light pull to keep the boat from drifting.

"This is where she was, Joe?"

"Ay, ay, sir."

"Over with the grapple and pull slowly."

A barbed hook was cast over and let drop about twenty feet into the sea, and then the boat was slowly pulled over the spot twice.

"If the cutter had been sunk surely that grapple would have touched her."

"No," said Lieutenant Green, half aloud, "if she has sunk she must lie very much over."

Old Joe shook his head.

The lieutenant now looked to the right and to the left, but there was nothing but the tall cliff visible—not an opening of any sort through which the cutter could have slipped and found shelter.

The mystery was complete.

"I cannot make it out," said the lieutenant.

"In course not," whispered Joe to the man next to him.

"Pull back, my men."

This the men set to work upon with a right good will, and despite of the tide [illegible] that bay they would have got the schooner's boat out of the little land-locked place with much greater speed than they brought it in had not a circumstance happened which induced the lieutenant to pause in his progress.

Just as the boat of the Spray crossed the beams of the moon again, something appeared to be floating in the water which looked like a small keg—such as a man might sling around his waist or across his shoulders if taking a journey where refreshment would be scarce, or impossible to get.

"What is that? In with it!" cried Lieutenant Green. "That will do."

The boat was backed a stroke or two and one of the men, leaning over, caught the little keg and dragged it into the stern at the feet of Mr. Green.

"What is it?"

"A keg, sir."

"It is metal, surely."

"Hold, sir—hold hard, ahoy!" shouted Joe, as he suddenly snatched the little keg from the lieutenant and flung it into the sea.

Joe was not one moment to soon with this movement, for scarcely had the object touched the surface of the water than it exploded with a loud report.

The fragments of it flew over the men, but no one was hurt with the exception of Lieutenant Green himself, who got a slight graze upon one temple.

The confusion which this little incident excited was soon over; but the men still kept the boat in the same position.

"This is diabolical, said Lieutenant Green, as he staunched the blood from his forehead with his handkerchief.

"Are you much hurt, sir?"

"Oh, no. A mere scratch. It was a shell."

"A sort of shell, sir."

"But what made you know it or suspect it, Joe?"

"I heard it make an odd noise, sir, and I all of a sudden recollected I had seen such a thing in the Spanish Main, sir, when the pirates came into a town called Guyaquilla, or something like that, sir."

"There is something more in all this than I can make out," added the lieutenant. "Pull back at once."

"Ay, ay, sir!"

The men soon traversed the distance now to the Spray and Lieutenant Green at once dived into the captain's cabin, to report what had occurred to the Honorable Charles Minto Grey, who was lolling as usual upon a sofa and smoking.

"Sir, I would report to you."

"Oh, well, sit down. Take a weed."

"Thank you, sir. The Rift has slipped through our fingers."

"Very good."

"Good, sir?"

"Ah, yes! I suppose now we can make sail to Ryde, or Cowes, or some of the yacht squadrons' places; for I never was so tired out in all my life of this den they call a state cabin. My man, too, says that all the Moselle is gone."

"Well, but, sir, it's the most singular circumstance."

"So I say; for, by Jove, I haven't drank it."

"But I mean about the Rift."

"Oh! ah—well?"

"Perhaps you did not pay much attention."

"Oh! by Jove, I did, though, for I fully expected another shot into the cabin. Why can't they take better aim. They must know where the captain's cabin is; and what is the use of plaguing him? Upon my word it is too bad! What is the use of having a great uncle in the admiralty, I should like to know? What is the use of everything and everybody? I'm bored to death!"

After giving utterance with unusual energy to those patriotic sentiments, Captain the Honorable Charles Minto Grey lifted his feet on to the sofa and made two or three plunging kicks, to signify how disgusted he was with society in general.

"It is provoking, sir."

"Oh! by Jove! yes."

"But still, sir, the best and the shortest way out of it is to capture the Rift."

"Go and do it then. You have my free leave. As long as I can have my weed and my Moselle, or sitting in peace, I don't care what you do."

"I will report to you then, sir, what happened. We chased the Rift into the bay and thought we had her quite secure, when she disappeared in a wreath of smoke."

"What?"

"She disappeared in a wreath of smoke."

The Honorable Charles Minto Grey puffed out a volume of tobacco smoke, and as it curled up to the ceiling he said:

"Like that?"

"Something like that, sir."

"What then?"

"Why sir, here we are and the Rift has gone!"

"Very good. Pass the bottle—help yourself."

"Thank you, sir. I would, therefore, respectfully ask what you would wish done?"

"Well, I tell you what I will do."

"Yes, sir."

"I will play you at cribbage for a half guinea a game for one hour, the winner to consent to play again for one hour whenever the loser likes."

"But about the Rift, sir?"

"Well, didn't you say it was gone?"

"Yes, sir."

"Then enter in the log that the Rift is settled and had gone off in its own smoke—I don't know what the admirality require further—and then make for Portsmouth."

"Were not the orders, sir, to report to Sir. Thomas Clifford, the port admiral, at Falmouth."

"Oh! by Jove, yes! Well, make for Falmouth."

"Yes, sir."

"And let them be smart about it. I shouldn't a bit wonder if old Clifford don't keep a good cellar. Those old muffs often do. Make for Falmouth at once."

"And give up the chase, sir?"

"Why, good gracious, where is the chase? Have you not just told me she has gone off in a puff of smoke or something of that sort? Foundered, of course. Foundered at sea. You can enter in the log that after an engagement, lasting six hours, the Rift was hulled no end of times and at last hit between wind and water and down she went with all hands. That will do, I take it."

"Very good, sir."

Lieutenant Green went slowly upon deck. There was sufficient of the sailor about him to make him feel intensely mortified with the whole affair, and as he could not satisfactorily account to his own mind for the disappearance of the Rift, it was with great reluctance that he gave the order to steer for Falmouth.

"Can you make out anything, Mr. Royle?" he said, as the sailing master took his glass from his eye, with which he had been taking a long observation of the coast and the bay.

"No, sir. Only some people on the top of the cliff."

"Oh, that's nothing."

"It ain't much, sir—only the odd thing is that they seemed to come this way over the edge of it, and they get out of sight somehow that I can't make out."

"Let me look."

Lieutenant Green took a long look and he saw the same phenomenon that had surprised Mr. Royle. Along the top of the cliff he saw a man come in somewhat of a crouching position, and when he got to the extreme verge, he seemed to disappear over it, or into it, in some way.

For the moment the lieutenant thought that he must have fallen over, and he shifted the glass down to the sea, expecting to see the splash of his fall; but such was not the case.

"I can't make that out," he said.

"Nor I, sir."

"It strikes me, Mr. Royle, that there is something more about all those cliffs and rocks than we know of."

"Sure of it, sir."

"And now we shall see no more."

Unknown Islands of the Pacific.

The fact that two islands of considerable size have recently been discovered in the Pacific Ocean shows that we have yet much to learn of this great watery expanse. The latest discovery is an island lying less than 100 miles from the northen coast of New Guinea. It has been named Allison Island, is nearly three miles long, rises from 100 to 150 feet above the sea, and has abundant timber. Several specks of fertile and inhabited land, some of them much larger than Allison Island, have been found within a few years at a distance of one hundred to two or three hundred miles from the New Guinea coast, and similar discoveries are made once in a while in various parts of the Pacific.

Oceanica is so large that no map of it can be given in an atlas except on a minute scale. We see hundreds of groupe and solitary islands huddled together on the maps, and get the idea that the Pacific is thickly studded with verdant bits of land. The fact is, however, that vessels may sail among these islands for many weeks without once coming in sight of land. Only a few months ago a crew that had been shipwrecked in the great island region of the Pacific rowed north for forty days before they reached Hawaii, the nearest land. Mr. A. R. Wallace, who has travelled widely in the Pacific, expressed the opinion some time ago that there are still a good many islands there that have never yet been seen by white men.

Once in a while a Pacific trader finds some new or little known island, and opens trade with its inhabitants. If business thrives, he keeps his seeret as long as he can, so as to enjoy a monopoly. It was found a while ago, when the Woodlark Islands were explored, that an Australian firm had carefully charted the islands several years before, and had been quietly trading there, all unknown to the other Pacific merchants.

The English in Egypt

English influence in Egypt is of such a character that it is doubtful whether England will ever be able to withdraw. The quality of English justice is now so well understood, not only in Lower Egypt but all over the country, that the Fellahs of Upper Egypt are beginning to come long distances, in many cases even on foot, to Cairo for the purpose of seeing the "Englishman," meaning some British administrator whose assistance they seek against the tyranny of the Pashas. They appear to have perfect confidence that if they can only "see the Englishman" they will obtain justice and relief. On one Sunday recently no fewer than seven petitions were received from natives of Upper Egypt against acts of the Pashas. This feeling of the fellaheen in favor of English administration and the confidence these poor people have that in any case they are safe from the vengeance of the Pashas is one of the most hopeful signs in Egypt. The Fellaheen of Egypt like the Bengalese will always need the protection of a stronger race, and their appreciation of English administration will probably end in their becoming eventually recognized British subjects.

The French Navy.

There is no doubt about the French navy being in a deplorable condition, and the recent disclosures of Admiral Aube to the budget commitee have directed a good deal of public attention to the matter. But, besides the inferiority of the French navy, not only to that of England, but also to that of Italy, the inefficiency of the French naval ports is also beginning to cause some uneasiness. Cherbourg, for instance, has been called by the minister of marine a veritable nest of bombshells, and any ships that would seek refuge there in time of war would be doomed to inevitable destruction. Other critics hasten to point out that England holds the Mediterranean in order to envolep France in an immense net which is spread from Gibraltar to Malta and thence to Cyprus and Egypt. Considering the dismal prospects conjured up by the Anglophobists at the present moment, it is surprising to hear them call out with all their might for the reorganization of the navy. The Gallic fleet will, however, have a long and arduous task whenever the duty is assigned to it of transforming the Mediterranean into a "French lake."

The Word "Ballot."

It is more than probable that nine out of ten readers, if suddenly called upon to give an account of the word "ballot," would put it down as the creation of American democracy, though nothing could be farther from the mark. A reference to Dr. Murray's English Dictionary shows that we are indebted for the word that at this moment is on every lip to the Venetian oligarchy. It was borrowed directly from the Italian, and makes its first appearance in English, both as noun and verb, so early as 1549, in William Thomas's Historie of Italy. The ballot was of course in the first place simply the actual ball dropped into the box in voting so that possibly there was sound etymology as well as wit in the late Mr. Bernal Osborne's identification—the scene was laid in Ireland—of "vote by ballot" and "vote by bullet."

West's Cough Syrup instantly relieves and speedily cures bronchitis, sore throat and all throat diseases. Try it and be convinced. All druggists.
World-wide is the reputation of West's Cough Syrup the truly marvellous remedy for cough, colds, croup, whooping cough, asthma and consumption. All druggists.

To the Editor of the STANDARD.
SIR,—Kindly permit me space in your paper for a few remarks anent Mr. Christoe's very gentlemanly remarks respecting himself. As [illegible] vs. Euphrasia, was fully and fairly discussed by one who doubtless had no th ing more than a historical knowledge of the matter, I had intended not to notice any more of his badgeries; but as he appears to be still smarting under the lashes of what he (Christoe imagines to be Bob. Myles whip: and as he has tried in vain to saddle myself and Mr. Elliott, with his own sins of omission as well as commission, it is only fair that I should add a few more facts corroberative of those already published by Mr. Elliott. Christoe in his letter signed "one who was there" states that I let the work illegaly; this statment is a kin to his general habit of misrepresentation. At the Council Meeting referred to by Mr. Elliot, I left fully determined not to enterfere again with the matter until the December session of the County Council, at which time I would have taken the proper steps to compel Artemesia to contribute her share towards the performance of the work in question: But lo and behold W. J. McFarland appeared on the scene "when the now notorious letter had its birth." (If the Dr. had many births like the one referred to, to attend he would soon tire of his profession.) Now Sir—nothing that Mr. Elliott could have said to me, would have induced me to proceed with the work without Dr. Christoe's written statement signed as Reeve, desiring Mr. Elliott to see me, and if possible to pursuade Euphrasia Council to leave the work in abeyance; if not successfull in that, then to join in the work, and he Christoe would asist in carrying a grant. The absurdity of Christoe charging Mr. Elliott with treachery for handing that letter to myself; as a guarantee of good faith that Christoe would take no advantage of the informal manner with which the work was proceeded with, (as far as Artemesia was concerned) must be apparent to the most casual observer. Again charging Mr. Elliott with derilict in not pressing the Council to make a grant, is a piece of the most brazen effrontery, while Christoe knowing that he had written, if honest, or possessed of any principle, should have laid the whole matter before the Council; the pressure brought to bear, which caused him to change his mind, a reasonable excuse for complying &c., using his vote and influence to obtain a grant, if he failed, and notified Euphrasia to that effect, he Christoe would have been relieved of his pledge, and could have claimed the respect of an honest honerable man, which with all his badgeries I was led to believe he was. But alass! how vain are the hopes of man, when brought in contact with such characters as Christoe. In conclusion I would say that as Mr. Elliott reported every statement made by "one who was there," I have only to corrobarate his refutation of some of the most glaring fabrications; such as, an honest jury gave an honest verdict. No jury gave a verdict it being one of those cases, that after hearing the evidence it turned out to be one upon which a jury, could not, or are not, allowed to decide. There was no decision if I mistake not, all being reserved until it could be argued in Chambers. Since I opened Christoe's eyes so that "he could see Myles and Myles away." He, Christoe, has been unabled to see Farewell and Myles in complicity with Elliott, in this discussion; with his increased vision, it is strange that Christoe does not see as far as Owen Sound. Respecting Mr Elliott's complicity, I have not either written or spoken to that gentleman since the winter of 1884. Mr. Elliott's letter was a statment of facts and requlred no complicity with any one, to enable him to relate them; and all Christoe's abuse of the writer cannot set them aside.
Yours &c.,
ROBERT MYLES.

YOUNG FOLKS.

WINKLE.

BY HANS GOEBEL.

A funny name for a cat, was it not? But she came by it in this way. Farmer Clifford had a dear little girl named Nellie who thought "periwinkle" was the prettiest name of anything that grew in their old-fashioned garden, which was full of roses, and pinks, and holyhocks, and bachelors' buttons, and sweet William, and hearts-ease, and forget-me-nots, and all sorts of sweet-scented flowering herbs. And so when her father brought home a cunning little Maltese pussy-cat for her "very own" she immediately gave it the favorite name from that dear old-fashioned garden. Now, "periwinkle" was rather a big name for such a little kitten, and so at mamma's suggestion it was shortened to Winkle.

Farmer Clifford lived away back in the country, and was not a rich man, so they all had to be very saving and careful in everything. His little Nellie did not have as many playthings and pets as some other children, and Winkle was prized accordingly. But you must not think she was any less happy than the happiest of my little readers, for she was as joyous and light-hearted as a bird from morning till night.

In the summer she went with the boys to bring home the cows, and picked strawberries, or raspberries, or blackberries in her bright tin pail. And sometimes she would take off her shoes and stockings and wade in the cool brook. In the winter what fun it was to build snow-men and forts, or huts such as were in the boys' geography, and play Esquimaux in them. And on the stormy days papa played cat's cradle with her or helped her to read and spell. Nellie loved her home and free country life but thought that if she only had a dear little kitten to love and cuddle and play with, she would be perfectly happy. So one day when farmer Clifford was coming home from the distant market and saw a deserted little Maltese kitten piteously meowing in the road, he got out of his wagon and picking up the poor half-frozen thing, put it in the pocket of his great coat and carried it home safe and warm.

O dear, if you only could have seen the sport that kitten created for Nellie. She wondered she had not felt lonesome without it. It made enough fun for two or three houses. Why, it understood more games than a city cat could even imagine. There was tip-over-the-basket play, and tangle-up-the-thread play, and roll-a-ball-of-yarn play, and hide and seek around the broom, and turning summersaults, and chasing its tail, and after a while it learned to run up Mother Clifford's back and sit on her shoulder. And indeed they all agreed, with its little mistress Nellie, that Winkle was "the darlingest, playfulest, cunningest kitten" ever known.

As she grew older, however, she learned many naughty tricks that spoiled all her beauty and playfulness and finally ruined her, causing much sorrow and anxiety to loving little Nellie who had built so many air castles for herself and Winkle.

WINKLE'S SINS.

One morning when Mother Clifford opened the door of her dairy she started back with an exclamation of surprise and displeasure, for there, right in front of her, was a large pan of milk with the cream licked off the top. Such a thing had never happened in that dairy before. Who had done it?

"That must be Winkle," said the farmer.

"O, no," said Nellie; "Winkle is good. She would not do such a thing, would she mother?" (You see in this home, away back in the country, the beautiful word mother had never been tortured into ma or mamma, as is the fashion in cities and towns.)

"I don't know, darling," was the reply. "I am afraid she is the culprit. I have noticed of late that she is inclined to be something of a thief."

Winkle a thief? What a horrible thought. Nellie could not believe it. There must be some mistake. And she took kitty up in her arms and petted her more than usual to make up to her for the suspicions of the family.

Before long, however, she was herself convinced of pussy's guilt for the very next morning, as the milk-room door was opened, there was a sound of a splash, a struggle, a smothered "meow," and then a cat all covered with cream, the milk dropping from each paw and every hair of her now white fur, flew past them all and out of doors. Yes, there was no mistaking her this time. That half-drowned and much frightened thing was certainly Winkle.

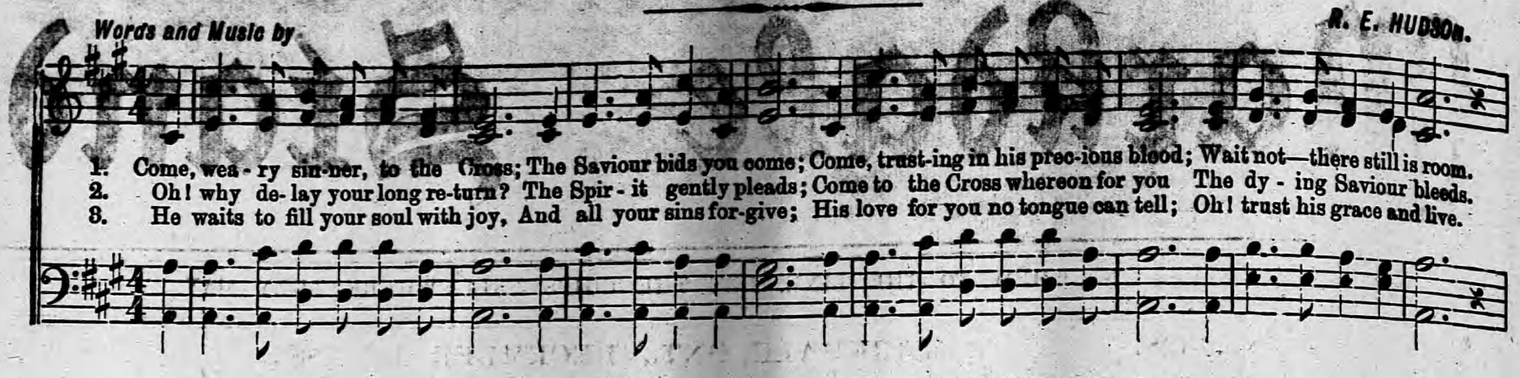
This was Nellie's first grief—to have her beautiful cunning kitten, that she loved so much, turn out a thief, all the brightness seemed suddenly to have gone out of that summer day.

Bad habits and evil tendencies seem to grow very rapidly, after a first indulgence, even in cats. So it was with Winkle. She could not be trusted at all after that. If she found the table laid ready for dinner she was sure to jump up on it and eat anything she could catch before some one drove her down. Nothing was safe from her greediness. She would chase the birds out in the yard and fields, and often brought one to the house, all broken, bleeding, dying. And once when, after the winter killing, there had been some delicious head-cheese made, that naughty cat stole into the pantry, though she had been well fed, and bit a piece out of every mould full of the nice meat.

Nellie's heart, all this time, was very sorrowful over these things, and very anxious as to what would happen next.

At last the climax came. The farmer had one pet, a fine canary, which was a brilliant singer, and of which they all thought a great deal, and when Winkle found the pantry doors closed against her and the dinner table and dairy closely guarded, she turned her covetous eyes on Dick. Poor Dick! The farmer, coming from the fields to tea with a handful of groundsel as a treat for his bird, found only an upset cage and a few green and yellow feathers. This was more than he could bear, and so he ordered the hired man to take the thief, and now murderer, and drown her in the creek.

At this Nellie's grief burst forth, and she begged her father for the cat's life, promising that she would keep her out of doors and in the barn if only they would not kill her. This was granted.



"But mind you, Nellie," said her father, "the next time there is any cause for complaint against that cat she will be killed without further notice."

The Sailor-Fish.

In the warmer waters of the Indian Ocean a strange mariner is found that has given rise to many curious tales among the natives of the coast thereabout. They tell of a wonderful sail often seen in the calm seasons preceding the terrible hurricanes that course over those waters. Not a breath then disturbs the water, the sea rises and falls like a vast sheet of glass; suddenly the sail appears, glistening with rich purple and golden hues and seemingly driven along by a mighty wind. On it comes, quivering and sparkling, as if bedecked with gems, but only to disappear as if by magic. Many travellers had heard with unbelief this strange tale; but one day the phantom craft actually appeared to the crew of an Indian steamer, and as it passed by under the stern of the vessel, the queer "sail" was seen to belong to a gigantic sword-fish, now know as the sailor-fish. The sail was really an enormously developed dorsal fin that was over ten feet high, and was richly colored with blue and iridescent tints; and as the fish swam along on or near the surface of the water, this great fin naturally waved to and fro, so that, from a distance, it could easily be mistaken for a curious sail.

Some of these fishes attain a length of over twenty feet, and have large, crescent-shaped tails and long sword-like snouts, capable of doing great damage.

In the Mediterranean Sea, a sword-fish is found that also has a high fin, but it does not equal the great sword-fish of the Indian Ocean.

The church edifice at Shrewsbury, N. J., is 117 years old, and is built on the site of an old stone church erected over 200 years ago. A bible which was presented by Queen Ann is used in the service. The bible is printed in red and black inks, on thick paper, in quaint type.

Like all the most successful men in Wall-treet, Russell Sage never drinks during business hours. With the means at hand to gratify every appetite, he was shrewd enough to learn long ago that drinking and business do not go together, and his abstinence is reported to have netted him many thousands of dollars.

The English Sparrow.

English sparrows get a severe berating in a recent number of the London Academy, which says, "It is hard for a lover of birds to approach the 'sparrow question.' Sparrows are found to do more harm than snakes or tigers. Nature's thieves and vagabonds they are. This is the verdict of every one who investigates the matter. They drive away birds who do more good and little or no harm. For every noxious insect they destroy, they consume more corn than one likes to calculate. A Cheshire farmer, indeed, estimates the loss to England due to depredations of sparrows at £770,094 a year; and this loss is on the increase. The careful and long-continued experiments of Colonel Russell, in Essex, show that sparrows do unmitigated mischief, and the experience of our colonies and of the Americans confirm the facts beyond cavil. There is really nothing to be said for the sparrow. He carries destruction with him wherever he goes, and leaves devastation to mark his increase. From every point of view he must be looked upon as the enemy of man. Either he must give way to us or we to him; and just now his power is such that he seems in a fair way to become here, as he already has become in Australia, a factor in politics. The Colorado beetle can never commit such ravages as the sparrow is certain to do wherever he is allowed to go on unchecked.

Christmas Charity.

Charity is so closely linked with Christmas that no man is rich enough in the world's goods to know what the latter means, if he be poor enough in the goods of Heaven to lack the sense of Charity. The man who shuts his ear to the cry of Wretchedness and Want that wail at his very door, and dies leaving his wealth to found colleges and benevolent institutions, the world is pleased to call charitable; yet, on the Great Day of Reckoning—before Him who sifts the actions and motives of all the world—before him who praised the widow's mite, —I would rather take the place of the man whose possessions while on earth may never have exceeded a loaf of bread, and yet would give the big end of it to fill the mouth and dry eyes of him that had none. O Charity, sweet Charity, how grievously art thou misunderstood!

No; Charity lieth not in the endowment of colleges, nor hospitals, nor churches, nor benevolent institutions, nor, indeed, in the bestowing of gifts and alms. It is a deeper virtue; a virtue of the heart, an offspring of the soul, and if it springeth not thence, it is not Charity. It is easy to be charitable to those we love and know; our heart then thaws at once into generous action, but to those we do not know and whom we therefore think we are under no obligations to love, it is apt to freeze up tighter than the North pole. All mankind are strangers and we know no other world than that which gathers round our own cheerful hearth,—our own burdened table.

This state of affairs, however, cannot hold under the genial influence of Christmas. There is a magic about its turkey, and mince pie, and plum pudding, which seems to put us in good humor with ourselves, while at the same time, the holy graciousness of the season, the recollection of Him who was all Charity, comes over us, making us wish that our arms were long enough to throw around the world. It is then that we suddenly discover the sweet satisfaction that lies in Benevolence, that Charity, though it begins at home, need not end there, and that it is not the rich alone that have power to give "the charities that soothe and heal and bless."

I have alluded above to the magic powers of the plum pudding. Everybody knows it to be a national Christmas delicacy of England, and everybody knows, too, that it has rather a firm hold in this country, notwithstanding that it may occasionally be crowded out by its second cousin the mince pie. Both dishes, however, have their enemies—and bitter ones, some of them—but these generally show up in the coward stomachs comprising the army of dyspeptics, and there seems to be no danger that the reputation of either of these Christmas cates will ever suffer in the estimation of the valiant stomach.

"Yea, verily, the plum pudding is an institution and one not disposed to be crowded from the recollection by the turkey, nor the roast beef, nor any other preparatory dish that a dinner may be heir to.

And now that the dear old time for enjoyment is near, let us prepare to receive it with bulging hearts, and in a manner worthy of its rare coming and of its peerless deserts:

No shadowing Care, no bickerings here belong,
But Peace and Cheer and Merriment and Song.

A Cure for Diphtheria.

Mr. Delthil, of Paris, has become famous for his success in the cure of this disease. Large flat dishes, filled with spirits of turpentine, are placed in different parts of the room; sponges wet with it are placed at each side of the patient's head, and it is ever used to swab the throat. Mr. Delthil claims for his treatment sixty recoveries out of sixty-three cases, where it was instituted and carried out from the beginning of the disease.

THE LEGEND OF SAINT NICHOLAS.

In old Italian story, ere Florence went astray,
Misled by wealth and glory, in stern, sad Dante's day,
A certain Knight, in hard-fought fight, was captured by his foe,
Who swore a fierce, unknightly oath he would not let him go
Without a ransom such as might a king or prince set free—
Ten thousand golden crowns paid down—and that right speedily.
The Knight refused these cruel terms; they cast him then straightway
Into the castle's oubliette, where one poor loaf a day
And draught of water—less and less—were let down by a cord,
While a hoarse voice above exclaimed: "By order of my lord
Again I ask, wilt thou, Sir Knight, make terms for thy release?
If not—to-morrow—any day—thy dole of food may cease."
"I will not cast my children's bread to dogs," the answer came.
"I will not bring my babes and wife to beggary and shame.
I cannot raise ten thousand crowns—nor would I if I could.
Far better that my enemy should triumph in my blood
Than Pia with her sweet sad eyes, and Nella with her smiles,
And sweet Costanza, rosy-lipped, all kisses and all wiles,
Should come to poverty through me; for who is there but knows
The hardships that a maid of rank, undowered, undergoes?"

But his lady fair discovered where her lord was held in prison.
In her woman's might, for her own true Knight, to the rescue she has risen.
She has mortgaged their castle stern and grim, and all she can sell has sold;
She has pledged the dower she brought to him for three thousand crowns in gold;
She has pawned her tapestries, lace and plate, her jewels and robes and furs—
There is nothing in all her coffers left of the treasures that once were hers.
Still, lands and stuff were not enough to set the captive free:
A thousand golden crowns she lacks to buy his liberty.

She has taken her three little girls by the hand, Costanza, Nella, and Pia,
And she stands with shame on her glowing face, in open day in the market-place,
She holds out her hand with a piteous grace, and alms drop down at her feet apace,
For her wifely courage and woeful case melt the hearts of all who see her.

The ransom was completed thus by public charity.
They weighed the gold, its tale they told; they set the captive free.
The gallant Knight with armor bright he to the fight had sped;
A broken cripple he came back, with bowed and silvered head.
He entered his courtyard still and bare; no wife came forth with greeting;
Costanza, Pia, and Nella were there, with tearful eyes and a frightened stare,
"Where is your mother, children—where! Is this our longed-for meeting?"

"Oh! father, come; you must make her wake; she lies all white on her bed."
They took his hand and they led him up to the chamber of the dead.

A dull despair came over him there, and it lasted many a day.
The damp, the mould, the cruel cold of that fatal cell on his life had told:
They had made him a man prematurely old, and had turned his black locks gray.

Not far from the good Knight's garden wall a little low hut there stood,
Where he whom we call Saint Nicholas dwelt, then only known as the Good.
We know how he looks from our story-books, as he travels our land of snow.
But he was a Florentine cobbler once, in the far off Long Ago.
He was old and gray, and merry, they say, and his cheeks though withered, were red.
His dress was leather, whatever the weather, with a hood to pull over his head.
He saw the Knight sit night after night alone in a big straw chair;
He could hear him groan as he sat alone, and wrestled with dumb despair.
"I shall die; I am dying," was ever his plaint; "and alas! when I am gone,
My three poor portionless pretty maids will be left in the world alone.
These poor little feeble creatures left to the cruel mercies of men—
Costanza seven, and Nella eight, and Pia, the eldest, ten.
I cannot even provide the fee each convent asks with a nun,
O Father, strengthen my heart for me till I say, Thy will be done!"

"Alas! alas!" good Nicholas cried, when he heard the sad Knight's words,
"I see it needs hope to prop up faith and to bend our wills to the Lord's.
Last night I saw Costanza sweet feed a bird with her scanty bread,
And blithe little Nella blew me a kiss as she mounted the stairs to bed:
And motherly, patient, pious, and good is the eldest of all of them—Pia;
I think the angels must love that child as they bend from their thrones and see her
Patiently sewing and mending by night, and hearing her sisters prarers,
And folding their clothes and making them neat, with her little motherly airs.
I have gold in my chest the Lord has blessed my labors from day to day:
Three thousand crowns in gold I hold till He shall give it away.
'Twas His by vow, long, long ago, and now I wait His word
To say in my heart, 'Rise, do thy part, bestow the gift of the Lord.'

I seem to hear that voice draw near. Speak, Lord; is it really so?
My dearest Lord, may I spend my hoard? In Thy name may I go
And rain on this desolate house a shower, a shower of golden rain,
Till each sweet flower beneath its power shall blossom in hope again?
But, ah! I must do my part in stealth, for kindness may be unkind
If it woundeth the pride of a noble race, and leaveth a sting behind."

He sat down then on his cobbler's bench, and he made him a bag to hold,
Packed close and tight, a thousand bright red crowns of Venetian gold.
The bells at midnight rang out clear on Christmas Eve so merrily
When the good man crept like a thief in the night on his errand of charity.
The sad Knight keeping his lonely watch sat still in his big straw chair,
And the maidens three in their purity asleep in their chamber were.
He gave one look—good aim he took—the bag fell flop on the floor;
It burst, and out of it round the Knight a golden shower did pour.
Upon the bag there was written thus: "Take this and dower thy Pia,
God loves the faithful, and His eyes with sweet approval see her."

Down on his face the father fell, the gold all scattered round him.
"God will provide," a kind voice cried; "never again misdoubt Him."

The next night came good Nicholas, cautious, by by-paths creeping,
When all the town had gone to rest, and the three babes were sleeping.
"How shall I fling my bag," he said, "to-night for little Nella?
I would not have it miss its mark, and yet to-night the house is dark;
I cannot see of light a spark, from coping-stone to cellar."

But as he spake out peeped the Moon—sweet Lady Moon soft-hearted,
And with a smile the curtain clouds that hid her face she parted.
She let a shining beamlet fall where the old Knight was lying,
And in a moment, quick as thought, another bag came flying.
The Knight sprang quickly to his feet, still deeming he was dreaming,
But through the window on the floor a flood of light was streaming,
And Lady Moon peeped down to see (for she had none to tell her)
How the glad father joyfully received the bag marked "Nella."

The third night came, this time all black with clouds and drenching rain,
Saint Nicholas to his good work crept stealthily again.
He carried in his hand a bag on which were writ these words:
"For her who, though in need herself, yet fed God's little birds."
But as he raised his arm to fling this his last gift of gold,
Two arms behind him clasped him tight, with a convulsive hold.

The arms that grasped him were the Knight's. "Oh, Nicholas," cried he,
"Servant of God, why should you seek to hide yourself from me?
Here in my little maidens' names I humbly kiss thy hands,
And pray this deed that thou hast done be told through many lands."
"Nay, nay, Sir Knight, I beg, I pray—I kneel upon my knee—
Let this thing be a secret kept between thyself and me.
I love, when all are sound asleep, to creep by stealth at night,
And comfort little lonely babes, or add some new delight
To those that happy homes provide for good girls and good boys.
If watched, how could I carry round my sweetmeats, cakes, and toys?
Be silent, then, Sir Knight; some day my mission will be over;
Then tell them all (for then you may) I was the children's lover."
But as he spoke the midnight bells seemed as by one endeavor
To ring out softly like a chime. Forever—ever—ever!

Eight hundred years have passed, and still the good saint has permission
On every Christmas Eve to start upon his happy mission.
He carries round the world that night (to fill our hearts with wonder)
Gifts to make children's Christmas bright, and burst their socks asunder.
His name is now a household word, to no one land restricted,
But world-wide and "for evermore," as the church chimes predicted.
We know him, love him; his pet name we hail with glad applause,
All happy children's patron saint, our own dear Santa Claus.

He may be, but if he tells you that any preparation in the world is as good as Putnam's Painless Corn Extractor distrust the advice. Imitations only prove the value of Putnam's Painless Corn Extractor. See signature on each bottle of Polson & Co. Get "Putnam's."

The question why "t" is silent in "often," "soften," "hasten," "castle," and kindred words, has been explained on the ground of physiology and environment. This explanation is entirely correct, the "t" in the words named being placed between consonants which are pronounced more easily than the hard and sharp "t" is As a matter of convenience or laziness therefore the "t" was dropped, and the less pedantic pronunciation has become the standard.

Colonel Ingersoll declares that "no man has a right to own more land than he can use." The Colonel should explain the uses he has for one half a ranch in New Mexico, ninety miles long and sixty miles wide.

A St. Louis editor, who started without a cent forty years ago, is now worth $100,000. His fortune is all owing to his own energy, industry and frugality, and the fact that an uncle recently left him $99,999.99.

Happy Responses.

Andrew Jackson, it is related, was at one time entertained at dinner by a gentleman, and among those present was one of those people who often find their way into story books, etc., as the style of that offensive class of Americans who are always trailing their nationality in the dust in the effort to extract their individual independence. This particular gentleman, over the wines and walnuts after dinner, in order to emphasize his own independence of disposition, of which he was loudly boastful, remarked to General Jackson:

"I always vote against you, sir."

The company was naturally rendered speechless by this unexpected disclosure, and the scene actually looked squally; but General Jackson put a stopper on the boastful individual and avoided further trouble by smilingly remarking:

"And I, sir, have always fought the battles of my country that you might enjoy that privilege."

Another instance of a happy response is that of an old Southern judge, but whether judge by courtesy or in fact, the writer cannot state, who must have had the faculty of quick and appropriate reply pretty well developed, if the story related of him is true. Speaking at a certain place one evening in the interest of his own candidacy of Congress, some one in the audience, who evidently had a good memory, inquired:

"Didn't you speak here just before the war?"

"I did," promptly responded the judge.

"And didn't you say we could whip the durned Yankees with pop-guns?"

"I did," replied the unabashed judge, "but confound 'em, they wouldn't fight that way."

Peculiarities of the Trout.

A writer in Chambers' Journal says, "I put a quarter pound trout, along with others, into a perfectly barren loch. In two years some of these trout attained to four and a quarter pounds weight, developing huge fins and square or rounded tails, lost all spots, took on a coat of dark slime, grew huge teeth and became ferocious in that short time. The common brown trout, taken from a very high burn in the hills, in two years became indistinguishable from the samlo ferex. The first year they grew to a pound or a pound and a half, took on a bright silver sheen of scales, were deep and high shouldered, lusty and powerful. This was when their feeding and condition were at their best; but as the food decreased the trout rapidly increased in number, spawning in innumerable quantities, and with no enemies the larger fish began to prey on the smaller, grew big teeth, swam deep and lost color, grew large fins and a big head, and became salmo ferex, so called."

Catarrh, Catarrhal Deafness and Hay Fever.

Sufferers are not generally aware that these diseases are contagious, or that they are due to the presence of living parasites in the lining membrane of the nose and eustachian tubes. Microscopic research, however, has proved this to be a fact, and the result is that a simple remedy has been formulated whereby catarrh, catarrhal deafness and hay fever are cured in from one to three simple applications made at home. MARKDALE, DEC. 16. 1886,

—The Manitoba Elections took place last week resulting in a return to power of the Norquay (conservative) Government with a good working but reduced majority.

On Tuesday evening of last week a number of young people of the village assembled at the residence of Mr. Wm. Haskett and presented Mrs. Haskett with a handsome Toilet Case and the following address.

To Mrs. William Haskett, Markdale.

Respected Madam.—Permit us, on behalf of the Ladies and Gentlemen of Markdale, to express to you our high sense of esteem for your many estimable virtues, whenin are exemplified those Christian virtues which render your sex the highest adornment of God's work upon earth and on ever lasting blessings to society.

The virtuous mind has its own reward in the performance of good deeds; and, if anything could be added to the pleasurable emotions arising from moral rectitude and philanthropic duty we trust you will accept the congratulations of the people of Markdale in your noble performance of that duty.

You will please accept the accompanying Testimonial from our hands, on behalf of its donors—not for its intrinsic worth, but as a slight Testimonial of our respect, and hope it may be retained as an heir-loom for the guidance of succeeding generations in the path of duty in which you have set such an excellent example.

With heartfelt wishes for the future prosperity and happiness of yourself and your worthy partner in life.

Markdale December 6th 1886 — We are (on behalf of the people of Markdale)

Respectfully Yours
F. PORTER Chairman,
R. O. WHITBY Sec.

WHAT TRUE MERIT WILL DO.

The unprecedented sale of Boschee's German Syrup within a few years, has astonished the world. It is without doubt the safest and best remedy ever discovered for the speedy and effectual cure of Coughs, Colds and the severest Lung troubles. It acts in an entirely different principle from the usual prescriptions given by Physicians, as it does not dry up the Cough and leave the diseas still in the system, but on the contrary removes the cause of the trouble, heals the part affected and leaves them in a purely healthy condition. A bottle kept in the house for use when the disease make their appearance, will save doctor's bills and a long spell of serious illness. A trial will convince you of these facts. It is positively sold by all druggists and general in the land. Price, 75 cts., large bottles. E. O. W.

The increasing demand for West's Cough Syrup is evidence of its great virtue in all throat and lung diseases. Three sizes. All druggists.

A Caring Evil.—Children are often fretful and ill when worms are the cause. Dr. Low's Worm Syrup safely expels all worms.

TO THE ELECTORS
—OF THE—
Centre Riding of Grey.

GENTLEMEN:—

The writs for a General Election for the Local Legislature will be issued immediately.

On Tuesday the 21st day of December next, the nominations are to be made and Tuesday the 28th day of December fixed for polling.

Having received the unanimous nomination of the largest and most influential Conservative Convention ever held in the Riding. which met in October last, and having since received the most encouraging assurance, of support from the electors generally, I beg most respectfully to announce that I feel it my duty to accede to their wishes and accept such nomination.

I have been a resident of the Riding for thirty-eight years. During the greater part of that period I have been, more or less, actively engaged in the administration of your municipal affairs and while occupying prominent positions of trust in your County Council I have invariably been guided by a desire to protect and promote your interests.

My long residence in the Riding and practical knowledge of the working of our municipal institutions enable me the more readily to anticipate your special requirements, represent your grievances and obtain relief from oppressive legislation. If elected as your representative, I will endeavor faithfully to discharge my duty by giving effect to wholesome legislation and will advocate a more economical administration of the finances and of the Crown domain. As there is not space in a short address to fully explain my views I shall endeavor to attend meetings in the various Townships of the Riding before the elections and there discuss in detail the various questions now before the people.

In conclusion, I shall advocate equal rights and privileges to all classes and creeds of Her Majesty's subjects. Being a resident of the Riding and like many of yourselves engaged in farming operations, our interests are identical I shall do my best to advance them.

Relying on your cordial and generous support to elect me as your representative

I have the honor to be,
Gentlemen,
Your obedient servant,
JOSEPH ROBKE.

I am respectfully,

To the free and independent ... of Centre Grey.

GENTLEMEN:—The time is at hand when you will be ... ercise your franchise in the selection of a representative ... Assembly of Ontario. The duty which you owe to your co... and to posterity demands that you exercise that privelege ... settled determination to advance the best interests of our fair ... heat of party strife men of impulsive temperaments are apt to ... the re... issues involved in the living present. and to allow their judg... ents to becom... warped by the mere "shiboleths" of the dead past. The interests of our country ... the advancement of intelligence and the humanizing influence of our comm... With the view of giving effect to these sentiments, I beg to announce that I a... a candidate for your suffrages at the coming election, and I respectfully requ... that all my fellow electors who share these sentiments, will by their vote a... influence do what they can to secure my election.

It is proper that you should ask, and it is right that I should declare, what ... opinions are in reference to the issues which divide the "Parties" in Ontario ... the present time.

In the main I am in accord with the general course of legislation pursued a... with the principles enunciated and carried out for some years by the Mow... administration, and if elected I shall deem it my duty in the interests of t... I am free to admit that with all Governments there is a tendency to unnece... ary extravagance—against all such tendencies I shall deem it my duty as yo... representative to raise my voice and exert my influence.

In reference to the school law generally, my opinion is that recent legislati... has been largely in the interest of the teaching profession, and that the interes... of the public which ought to be paramount, have to a certain extent been igno... d.

I am of opinion that the present "holiday" terms are too long, especially to m... the requirements of rural communities, and that some change is desirable in th... respect.

The Little Boy on the Stairs.

H. S. KELLER.

No more I list the echo of his childish evening prayers;
No more I hear the patter of his feet upon the stairs;
No more I hear his laughter and his voice of sweet delight,
For the doors are closed up softly and the home is still to-night.
Where is the little boy who used to greet me with surprise—
With a cherry "hello! unky," and a twinkle in his eyes?
There's a quietness expressive in the shadow of the gloom
That has settled in each corner of my quiet little room.

I came to him a stranger and he welcomed me to him,
The little boy who lies to-night beneath the gaslight dim;
And he never stopped to question whether I was good or no,
His heart so full of pureness deemed that strangers' were also.
Never asked me if my living was to circumspect inclined;
Never asked me if I nurtured aught of evil in my mind.
And the little boy who used to greet me on the hallway stairs,
"Dood ev'nin' unky," as he went to say his childish prayers—
He has gone away and left us and I'll never see him more
With his bonnie eyes and roguish cheeks behind the hallway door.

ONE CHRISTMAS EVE.

BY ARCHIE MACK.

"Hark the herald angels sing,
Glory to the new-born King!"

Grandly the music rolled from under the fingers of the practised organist of one of our city churches, and the voices of the choir swelled with exultation, as the inspiring words again reverberated through the stately edifice and cleaving their way, sought and found a more extended sphere—the calm night air of the great outside.

It was Christmas Eve, and the practise was for the morrow. Youth, health, and good spirits were depicted on every face, and even the sanctity of the place and words could not wholly control the bounding, mirthful spirits of the more thoughtless of the singers.

Once more the words rang out, jubilantly, exultingly, and the tones, carried on the still night air, pierced the slight protection of a small dwelling not far from the church, and caused one of its occupants, a feeble old woman, to move uneasily on her miserable pallet, and inquire,

"What is it, James? Singing, or am I dreaming?"

The old man addressed as "James," bent tenderly over the emaciated form of her he called wife, and answered soothingly, "It is from St. John's church. They are practising for to-morrow, Mary."

"Why for to-morrow?" she queried absently.

"It will be Christmas Day, dear."

"Christmas Day! Ah, yes, now I know the very words they are singing, James. But how cold it is, and—have you had supper?" as if a sudden thought had struck her.

The old man moved uneasily, and hastily going to the grate stirred the little pieces of wood, that were supposed to warm the room.

"Put more wood on," she said faintly.

He turned his back to her and the tears rose unbidden in his eyes, and when she repeated the command, he said sadly, "I have not got any, Mary."

She lay silent for a moment or so, then asked again,

"Had you supper, James?"

Unwillingly he confessed he had not, nor had he anything to make supper off.

"Old, sick, hungry, and cold," she said bitterly, "no relief except in death!"

"Hush, dear. He knows best, and will send us help in His own good time."

A short silence ensued.

"Give me your hand, James," she said feebly.

He drew a rickety stool to the bedside, and sitting down, gently drew her hand towards him. A smile lighted up the wan, old face as she said, "You make me think of our courting days, James. Those days, how fair and bright they were, and—we loved each other!"

"And do yet, Mary, though nearing the end of our journey. God willing, we will love each other to the end."

"Amen!" fell reverently from the trembling lips, and then silence settled down on the old couple, and he gently carressed the hand that lay in his, and listened to the bursts of melody that ever and enon floated out from the House of God in his vicinity.

"James," and the aged face was turned to him, do you remember when we used to practise for Christmas? Christmas Eve comes to me always as a reminder of the time you first told me of your love, and ask me to share your life, for weal or woe. You remember, don't you, the little old church and the practises; Jennie Hayes was organist and leader as well. And that one Christmas Eve, when coming home, you spoke words that made me the happiest of girls. Oh, James, how I loved you!"

The old man stooped and kissed the face so near him, and her voice went on,

"Yes, I loved you. And just a year from that night we were married," and a smile lit up the pallid face at the recollection. "I remember it all so well. I was dressed in white, and we were married in the old farm-house sitting-room. Mother was crying, all the girls laughing, and I was so happy, so happy, James, for nevermore were we to be parted, till, as the minister said, 'death shall ye part,' and someway I think it is going to do it soon," she added dreamily.

The old man shivered and drew a little closer to his wife's side stroking her hand gently.

After a short silence, she resumed: "And our little house, you remember, it James, all covered with roses and honeysuckle, small but cosy, and we were so happy in it and care seemed a thing never to be thought of. How we enjoyed life! And then our little ones came to us, like angels lent from Heaven."

The weak voice stopped, and a tear or two welled slowly from the dim, aged eyes and rolled over the furrowed cheeks.

The old man's head had sunk lower and lower as she proceeded, but now he raised it, and in a husky voice, said, "Don't distress yourself, dear, it was all for the best, God knows it was for the best," and the carressing touch of the hand once more stilled the wife's sorrow.

Again she resumed: "I see them all so plainly. Jennie, and Willie, and Helen, Rob, Harry, and baby May, and they were such dear children! Then Jennie sickened and died. We strewed the coffin with white daisies, our girlie's pet flowers, and when I heard the clods fall on the coffin lid, I thought all the brightness and sunshine was gone from my life. Oh, how dark it seemed!"

The quivering voice died away in silence, the old man rubbed his eyes with his hand to brush away the tears that rose at memory of the loss of their firstborn, but presently she resumed, "Then bonnie Rob was carried home a crushed and crippled little lad, from that dreadful horse race, carried home to linger, suffer, and die. Oh, my God, what agony I suffered, as I saw, day by day, the bonnie, childish face grow pinched with suffering, and listened night after night to the moans of pain there was no easing! At last death eased our darling, and a second time we trod the wine-press of sorrow, hand in hand; a second time we listened to the dull fall of the earth as it was heaped above a loved one, little dreaming that the day would come when we would bless God for having taken home the wee ones to himself."

The pathos in the trembling voice was heart breaking, and the poor old man broke down completely, and cried like a child. Their tears were mingled in utter desolation and heartsickness, he clasping her hand, she with the other resting on his lowered head. At last he spoke: "Don't, Mary," he said huskily, "I cannot bear to think of it, don't review the past any more."

"I can't help it, dear," she answered wistfully. "I must speak out what I feel to-night, my whole life is passing in review before me."

"Well dear," he answered soothingly, "if it does you good, I will listen," and he bent and kissed the withered cheek.

"Dear James," and she was silent awhile, but not for long, again she took up the thread of her narrative. "After that we had a few years of peace, and happiness came back to us once more. Willie, Helen, Harry, and May, grew up like fair flowers in our home, and if we did not lay by money, at least we had every want supplied. Those were blessed, restful days after the fierce struggle we had gone through. Then again the storm burst over us. Our lovely Helen! I see her now as she went out from us that night, her brown eyes bright with expectation, her auburn hair clustering in countless, wayward curls over the proud little head—Oh, Heaven, why, why didn't she die as she stood there in her girlish innocence!" wailed the poor woman with a rain of tears.

Controlling herself she again went on: "It was years ere we saw her again, but often heard of what her career was proving. We then learned that Death was a welcome visitor compared to disgrace, and gladly would we have carried our erring one to her grave, could it but restore her the innocence she had flung away. After long years she crept back, like a hunted creature, to the old home to die. A pitiable wreck was all that was left of our bright, wilful girl, but even that was accepted with thanksgiving by us, and we did our best to cheer the few months she was spared to us. When she was carried to the little churchyard, bowed and broken we followed, and some were cruel enough to wonder why we wept over her. As if the love we gave her could be withdrawn, because she had strayed from the right path!"

Another silence followed, more pathetic in its stillness than the wildest weeping. With an effort she went on once more: "When Helen left us, it seemed as if the disgrace drove Willie to madness. He plunged into all kinds of dissipation, and when we tried to reason with him, left home in his wayward passion. Once and a while we would hear of him, but always the same, always the same, drinking and bad company. At last the end came. In one of his wild excesses he used the money entrusted to him by his employer, and when reason came back, he wakened to find himself a felon to the law of his country. Home came our wayward boy, and remorse coupled with his debauch laid him on his deathbed. When the officers of justice arrived to take him prisoner, they only found the lifeless body of him they sought. With generous kindness they left us alone with our dead, and the public never knew of that dark shadow on Willie's career."

Once more the weak voice faltered, and stopped. The old man kept on gently chafing the withered hand that lay in his, but his attitude betokened the deepest woe. The fire had almost burned out, the room was getting bitterly cold, but still he sat there. Again the weak voice resumed, but this time it was evident that exhaustion was fast overcoming the great sufferer. "None were left but Harry and baby May—Harry left the neighborhood and went sailing: He would come to see us occasionally, and how brave and handsome he looked! Our little snowflake, May, was courted and won by Fred Horace of the city, and went to his home a happy bride, carrying with her her parents' blessing. One day a letter came to us in a strange handwriting, and on opening it, it seemed as if the very sun was blotted from the heavens, so dark, so utterly dark was the clond it threw over our lives. Our Harry was dead! But he died as a brave man dies in trying to rescue another from drowning, but even that thought did not make the blow less bitter. The man he gave his life for was saved, but our boy was gone! Little comfort was there for us in the fact that the country rang with praises of his heroism, our sun had set, never to rise again. When May came to us and begged us to come and live near her, we complied. We sold the few things we had—the great bulk of our property had gone to repay 'Willie's' employer, for, James, you scorned to keep one cent till he was paid in full,—and moved in here. At that time it was a nice cosy little building, and May helped deck it for her parents. But in a few months we were doomed to stand beside her dying bed, and to carry to the grave the lifeless body of our last child, with her little babe dead on her bosom!"

A great sob burst from the old man, but the mother lay still with her eyes fixed as it were, on some object in the distance, but her face was drawn with the agony called forth by the recital. After a time both became more composed, and in a voice scarce above a whisper, she went on.

"Old, poor, and childless, we returned to our home. It went from bad to worse. My health broke down, often you could not find work, but we managed to live. Little by little our comforts were taken from us, and years have glided away and find us to-night without a bite to eat in the house, or a stick to keep us warm. James, it is more than I can bear!" she panted hoarsely.

"Mary, dear," said the old man gently, "to-morrow is Christmas Day, who knows what it will bring?"

"Forgive me, James," she gasped, more than spoke.

He bent and kissed her, a tear falling on her cheek as he did so.

"Try and sleep, Mary," he said, and every word was a caress.

"I think—I will," she said feebly. "God bless—you—James!" and the poor old face turned toward the wall, but still the faithful husband sat holding the hand of his wife, and gently fondling it.

Time passed slowly. The old man was chilled to the bone, and so cold himself, that he did not notice how cold the hand he was holding was growing. He was roused by the grand rolling music of, "Praise God from whom all blessings flow," as the choir was closing their practise, and at the same time the city clocks chimed the half after eleven. A cold chill struck to his heart, as he gazed at the hand he held, and felt how cold and stiff it had grown.

"Mary!" he whispered huskily, but no answer came from the still figure.

"Mary!" This time a heart's agony was in the cry, but still no answer, no move to show it was heard.

He rose unsteadily, and leaned over the bed so he could see the face of his wife. Cold, white as marble it gleamed, but a look of peace was on the aged face, a look it had been a stranger to, for many a long weary year.

"Oh, God!" he gasped, falling back upon the rickety stool, and then his head sank down on his chest, and he sat there, silent, still holding that cold hand, but no longer tenderly chafing it. Hours passed and he sat there still, in the same attitude. Daylight struggled in through the miserable window, but he never moved; midday was rung from the city clocks, but he sat there still.

In the afternoon, some kind Samaritan, found his way to the house, intent on helping the aged inmates to a few comforts. He knocked at the door, no answer. He knocked again, still no answer, so he opened it and stepped inside. What a sight met his gaze!

The old man still sat on the stool, holding his wife's hand, but both were dead, and had been for hours. For them all cold, and hunger, and sorrow had passed away forever.

Their last Christmas Eve had ushered them into the most glorious joys, they had entered the company of saints and angels.

Let us reverently drop the curtain and pass out, but, let us also never forget, that, "the poor and needy ye have always with you."

THE LIME-KILN CLUB.

When the janitor of the Lime-Kiln Club opened the doors of Paradise Hall on Saturday evening to make ready for the regular weekly meeting he found evidences of another attempt on the part of unknown scoundrels to wreck and destroy the headquarters of the club. This is the thirteenth attempt in six years to wipe out Paradise Hall, and in no case has any clue been found to lead to the guilty wretches. In the present instance it appeared that they effected entrance by one of the alley windows in the library. With a spite born of a lifetime of degradation, the fiends tore up and destroyed 285 almanacs of the date of 1880, and twenty-two annual reports of as many State prisons. They then knocked a plaster bust of Washington into the middle of last week, broke the sacred sword of Bunker Hill in two, and spilled a pint of milk over some manuscripts relating to the Glacial Epoch. They then entered the main hall, poured kerosene over Brother Gardner's desk, and would doubtless have started a conflagration had not some alarm driven them off.

The janitor had both bear traps and two spring-guns set, but the fellows seemed to know where danger lurked and avoided it. The only thing which may furnish a clue is the fact that two white men were seen in the alley the evening previous, and one of them was noticed to have a limp in his gait. The club will pay $50 for the arrest of every white man in the country who limps, and $100 if he is convicted of this dastardly destruction.

POOR CRITTERS.

"When you come to size mankind up in all de details, de result am sumthin' to make you feel miserable," said Brother Gardner, as the meeting was called to order.

"In my time I has known a poet whose varses brought tears to my eyes an' made de heart bulge out, an' yet dat poet left the snow on his sidewalk fur de public to wade frew, an' he sot cross-legged on de street kyar an' spit terbacker all ober the floo'.

"I has know a philanthropist to send off his check to an orfan asylum, an' send coal an' flour to desarvin' but destitoot fam'lies, an' on dat same day he would giv his hired man twelve cents fur a shillin' an' charge de hired gal fur breakin' a tea-cup.

"I has known a statesman whose influence could make or unmake a party—whose speeches war' read an' re-read—whose dignity in public was dat of an iceberg—I has known sich a man to climb up on de alley fence an' wrangle wid an ash peddler who had taken two bushels and a half of ashes and wanted to pay fur only two bushels.

"I hev read the writin's of a author who seemed to feel a sympathy fur de hull world, an' yit I seen dat same purson threaten de arrest of a seben-y'ar ole boy on de street who axed him for alms.

"I hev read de writin's of a man who claimed to sit on de high pedestal of complacency an' look down upon de turmoils of the world widout a shade of annoyance. I hev met dat same pusson in de alleys at night wid a lighted candle in hand to look fur a nickel which his child lost, an' de way he took on about dat trifle was 'nuff to bust de biler of a twenty hoss-power engine.

"We am all hypocrites. We am all two-sided. We hav got one face fur de public an' anoder fur private life. To sum us all up an' bile us down, we am all poo' critters an' a mighty long ways off from anythin' like perfeckshun. Let us now purceed to our reg'lar purceedin's."

AGRICULTURAL.

The Committee on Agriculture, to whom was submitted the inquiry from the Secretary of State of Illinois: "Has the turnip been properly encouraged in this country?" reported through its Chairmun as follows:

"Dis committee didn't jump on dat query wi l boaf feet all to once. We went slow. We looked into two city directories an' three histories, an' we talked wid seberal farmers who knew de turnip from his infancy up to ole aige. It am our concluahun, based upon paahient investigation, dat de turnip has had a far show in de United States. He has, indeed, bin 'lowed to crowd de onion into de back townships, an' to hustle de squash about in de liveliest manner. Fur a vegetable which contains ninety per cent. water an' ten per cent. of slush, de turnip has got along far better dan could be expected by de man who grafted a cucumber to a beet an' made him."

JUDICIARY.

The Committee on Judiciary reported in favor of a new section to the law regarding burglary the section to read as follows:

"In case a husband has $1.60 in his pocket on gwine to bed at night, an' he wakes up in de mawnin' to find all but ten cents gone, while de house shows no evidence of a forcible entry, an' de ole woman begins to talk about buyin' a welwet sacque, the presumpshun shall be dat de wife got up in de night an' took de money, an' if she doan' hand it ober de sentence shall be ninety days in de cooler."

The Rev. Penstock objected to the report being accepted, asserting that it was a slur on the honesty of the female sex.

"If de female sex doan' want to be slurred dey mus' let our pockets alone," said Brother Gardner. "I has bin a frequent wictim to sich mysterious transactions, an' I believe de time has arrove when a pa'r o' pantaloons hung across a bedroom cha'r at night should be held as sacred as de knobs on a church dosh. De report will be accepted an' de amendment forwarded to de nex' Legislachur to be atced upon."

A VIGILANCE COMMITTEE.

Giveadam Jones then brought up the matter of the hall having been broken into, and suggested that 1,000 pounds of dynamite be purchased and spread about in such a manner that it must go off and hurt someone if another attempt was made. Other suggestions were made and discussed, but the matter was finally decided by the appointment of a vigilance committee, which will watch the hall for the next month and open fire from the horse-pistol on everything moving in the alley after 7 o'clock p. m.

The meeting then adjourned.

HOUSEHOLD.

Christmas Dining.

I have still a savory remembrance of the Christmas dinners, which were also family reunions, at the "old homestead," when I was a child. For days previous the preparations had been going on. Oysters were pickled, mince, pun p in, apple pies and tarts were made; tongues and hams boiled; crullers, doughnuts and fruit-cake were fried and baked, and a barrel of cider made ready to be broached.

Being a favorite grandchild, I often spent this week in the dear old house, and a week of unmitigated delight it was. Early on the morning of the eventful day, the smell of savory cooking filled the house. The dinner itself was a banquet—turkeys, chicken pies, a huge roast of beef, a roast pig, with crisp, tawny crackling, and vegetables and sweets innumerable. The plum pudding, enveloped in its blue flame, always seemed to me like an apparition from a fairy tale, and I half expected to hear grandma murmuring words of incantation over it.

Dining, however, has changed with the times, and the old-fashioned Christmas dinner is almost a thing of the past. A description of a dinner given in Cooper's "Pioneers," shows us the art of dining as it was understood nearly two hundred years ago, and despite its rude lavishness, has no unappetizing sound. To-day we unite French skill and refinement with Canadian wealth of resources, and produce a gastronomic whole not to be equaled in any other country.

Raw oysters, or tiny little clams are a pleasant beginning to a feast of this kind, but may be dispensed with. If they are served, let them be on the shell, and very cold, with quarters of lemon and wafers, or very tiny squares of buttered brown-bread (Boston brown-bread). A very pretty fancy, where it can be carried out, is to serve them in a block of ice. Take a ten-pound piece and melt with a hot flat-iron a cavity in the top to hold the oysters, season them, place them in the ice, and let them remain in a cold place until wanted. The ice should be so shaped at the base that it will stand on a large platter, on which should be placed a folded napkin. Decorated with smilax, and a row of quarters of lemon at the base, it has a very charming effect at night.

If soup is served at all, let it be a very little bouillon, consomme, or amber soup. As amber soup is served at so many company dinners, I will give the recipe.

Take an old chicken, or the carcass of one or more roasted ones, break it in pieces, add a ten cent soup bone, and three quarts of water. Cook slowly for four hours, then add an onion fried in a little hot fat, with six cloves stuck into it, half a small carrot, parsley, and three stalks of celery, and cook another hour. The stock should have been reduced by boiling to two quarts. Strain into a large cake bowl, and the next day remove the cake of fat; take out the jellied stock, avoiding the settlings, which will do for some sauce or gravy; let it heat, and mix into it the beaten white and shell of an egg; skim off carefully, and strain through a fine strainer. It may then be heated when wanted, and a tablespoonful of caramel added for a richer coloring.

A game pie is a very nice thing to have on hand at Christmas; and, unless it is a very large one, is not likely to stay on hand long. It may be made from pheasants, partridges, grouse, or quail, but is better if made of two or more kinds of game. Clean the birds; cut the largest ones in four pieces, and the quails in two. Trim off all the inferior portions, necks, and lower ribs, and put them, with the giblets, into a saucepan, with a pint and a half of water; stew for an hour; meantime make a good paste and line the bottom and sides of a large, deep pudding-dish with it. Lay the pieces of birds in, and cover with tiny slices of salt pork; season each layer well, and make a forcemeat with a little finely-minced salt pork, the livers of the birds—which will be tender by this time,—sweet marjoram, thyme, minced parsley, and a half cup of bread-crumbs, the whole slightly moistened with warm milk. Spread a layer of this forcemeat over each layer of pieces of birds, and when the dish is nearly full, strain the gravy, season with salt, pepper, and a glass of wine, and pour into the pie. Put on the upper crust, cut a hole in the middle, and bake slowly at least three hours. Cover with a piece of white paper if it threatens to brown too fast. Ornament the top of the pie with leaves cut from the pastry, baked separately, and laid on afterwards. Examine from time to time, to see that it does not get too dry; and if necessary, add more of the gravy.

ENGLISH CHRISTMAS PLUM PUDDING.—Two pounds of raisins, two pounds of currants, one-fourth pound of citron or lemon-peel, one tea-cup of sugar, two thick slices of bread crumbled fine, seven eggs, a teaspoonful each of cloves, cinnamon and nutmeg grated; two pounds of beef suet, a piece of butter the size of an orange; about two pounds of flour. Mix it all with milk or water and boil four hours in a bag. This quantity makes two large puddings, and may be kept a month. Steam slices as it is wanted, and eat with a sauce.

Christmas Receipts.

DOUGHNUTS.—One pint of dough, two tablespoonfuls of melted butter, two eggs, two-thirds of a cup of sugar, one-half teaspoon of soda, nutmeg to flavor. Mix thoroughly and place near the fire to rise. Fry in hot lard.

FRUIT CAKE [by request].—One pound of sugar, one pound of flour, one pound of butter, nine eggs, three pounds of currants, two pounds of raisins, ten ounces of citron, one ounce of mace, one ounce of nutmeg, one and a half ounces of cinnamon, one teaspoonful of cloves, one teaspoonful of ginger, one and a half wine-glasses of brandy.

APPLE FLAPJACKS.—Two cups of sweet milk, two cups of flour, three eggs, one tablespoon of melted butter, one teaspoon of baking powder, one-half teaspoon of salt, two or three tart apples. Peel and slice the apples very thin. Make the batter in the usual manner and stir the sliced apples in it. Fry in hot lard and butter the full size of the spider. Pile on a plate as fried, spreading butter and sugar flavored with nutmeg, between them and on top. Serve hot, cut as pie.

A HOLIDAY PUDDING.—One pound of the best butter, one pound of suet, carefully freed from strings or skins, chopped fine, one pound of sugar, two and one-half pounds of flour, two pounds of raisins, seeded, chopped and well dredged with sifted flour, two pounds of currants, well washed, one-fourth pound of citron cut fine, twelve eggs, whites and yolks beaten separately, one pint of milk, one cupful of brandy, half an ounce of cloves, half an ounce of mace, two grated nutmegs. Beat the butter and sugar to a cream, beat in the well-whipped yolks, next stir in the flour alternately with the beaten whites, then spice, and the brandy and milk. Dredge the fruit well with flour and mix it all thoroughly. Boil five hours.

Christmas Ballad.

The storm is up on the lonely moor,
The wind is wailing and low;
My father hastened to fasten the door,
To keep out the blinding snow.

He fasten sit well with bolt and lock,
He shuts it with might and main;
As if there were never to be a knock
To-night at the door again.

My mother sits knitting with earnest zeal;
So swiftly her fingers go,
The stocking has almost reached the heel;
But my heart is weary and low.

I know in the village below just now,
They are ringing the Christmas chime;
That the youths bring in the misletoe bough,
And the maidens are singing the rhyme.

I care not for all their music and mirth,
I care not for all their glee;
There is one who sits by the lonely hearth,
And all for the love of me.

The flames flash up in their airy play,
Sunning the cottage wall;
But my heart is over the moor away,
With none to answer its call.

My father sits in his own arm chair,
His handkerchief over his head.
My mother looks up at the spiteful clock,
It is almost time for bed.

O mother, blest with such loving years,
O father—placid in sleep;
Little ye know of the blinding tears,
That my full heart cannot keep.

Well may I sit in the shadow and grieve,
For I passed him in scorn and pride;
When he asked me to be on this Christmas eve,
His plighted and chosen bride.

The storm hurried on more fierce and high,
The snow fills the topmost pane;
My latest hope is just passing by—
Will he never come back again?

But listen! I hear the gate's quick swing—
A step on the snowy track;
The bounding feet and the hurried spring
My throbbing heart, go back.

I see his face in the ruddy light,
I hear his welcome cheer;
O maidens wish me a Christmas bright—
A new and happy year!

The First Watch.

At first the watch was about the size of a dessert plate. It had weights, and was used as a "pocket clock." The earliest known use of the modern name occurs in the record of 1552, which mentions that Edward VI. had "one larm or watch of iron, the case being likewise of iron gilt; with two plummets of lead." The first watch may readily be supposed to be of rude execution. The first great improvement—the substitution of springs for weights—was in 1560. The earliest springs were not coiled, but only straight pieces of steel. Early watches had only one hand, and, being wound twice a day, they could not be expected to keep the time nearer than fifteen or twenty minutes in twelve hours. The dials were of silver and brass; the cases had no crystals, but opened at the back and front, and were four or five inches in diameter. The plain watch cost $1,500, and after one was ordered it took a year to make it.

A tramp got on the Air Line Railroad track near Simcoe, waved his hands, and stopped an express train. When asked by the conductor why he had stopped the train he replied that he had done it for a joke. He was arrested, tried, and given three months to work out the joke to its legitimate conclusion.

It is said that whenever an eruption of the Bromo volcano in Java takes place the natives kindle their firewood by the hot lava as it flows down the mountain, and keep the fire thus obtained for years. Should it go out, through neglect or accident, they never kindle it anew from matches, but they get a light from their nearest neighbor, whose fire was orginally obtained from the volcano. The fires in use, up to the late outbursts, in the native cooking places, were all obtained from the Bromo eruption of 1832.

RUTH ELLIOTT;

OR,

A PROPHECY FULFILLED.

A TALE OF SOCIAL LIFE IN CANADA.

BY W. E. BESSEY, M. D.

"And such is human life, so gliding on
It glimmers like a meteor, and is gone;
Yet is the tale, brief though it be, as strange,
And full, methinks, of wild and wondrous change
As any that the wandering tribes recount,
Stretched in the desert round their evening fires,
As any of old, in Erin hall or home,
To minstrel harps, at midnight's witching hour."

It was Christmas morning in the year 18— I remember well. The hills were covered with a mantle of spotless white. The storm, which had set in with sleet and rain, had ended in a heavy fall of snow. The boughs of the evergreen trees in the grounds of the Elliott mansion bent low under the weight of the fleecy covering with which they were laden, while the rain and sleet had frozen in icicles on the branches of the trees which winter had stripped of their foliage. And so the great drooping elms in the meadows, and the weeping willows on the lawns, were hung with crystal pendants, that, glittering in the morning sun, reflected the light in all the prismatic colors of the rainbow. Beautiful is the only word in the language that will express the fairy-like scene, such pranks artistic had Jack Frost played upon the window panes and among the trees about the home of the Elliotts, wreathing them with fantastic shapes, and clothing the shrubbery with crystal forms until they looked like some fairy bower.

The little snowbirds had crept forth from their hiding places and were circling through the air in whirling flocks. Winter in all its reality had come, that season when, as Shakespeare says:—

"Icicles hang by the wall,
And Dick, the shepherd, blows his nail,
And Tom brings logs into the hall,
And milk comes frozen in the pail."

Old James, the colored servant, was abroad in cheerful mood, clearing the walks with his broad snow-shovel. This was the first snow-fall of the season; it had been a regular nor'easter and the wild winds of the previous night had caused the snow to drift badly, but the big Newfoundland dog, Major, evidently thought clambering through the drifts and rolling himself gleefully in them glorious fun; thus contributing to the amusement and adding to the good humor of his friend old James, on this bright Christmas morning.

It was easy to see the roads leading to the city were heavily obstructed, as the milk vendors with their sleighs toiled heavily along on their way to supply their customers, but cheerily singing to keep time with the merry tinkle of the bells upon their horses.

Brightly the church spires shone in the distance, whilst the blue smoke, curling upward from a thousand chimney tops, told of a great city just awaking to the rejoicing of the gladdest day of all the year.

It was indeed a beautiful scene and one that the observer could not soon forget.

The mansion of the Elliotts was among the most pretentious of the many elegant private residences that adorned Dorchester Avenue, one of the principal approaches to the beautiful city of Montreal at that time, for then the palatial home of the princely knight and magnate of the Hudson Bay and Pacific Railway Company, had not yet been built.

The stranger would not be long in making up his mind that wealth, luxury, culture, and refinement were among the prominent characteristics of the residents of Dorchester Avenue, and that it was a city on whose trade and commerce prosperity had smiled, and to whose stately halls hospitality was no stranger, for of them it could not be said by any distinguished tourist, "I was a stranger and ye took me not in."

Such is the scene where our story begins; none more charming could be desired.

But let the reader imagine himself making a summer visit, and finding a city with great docks and extensive harbor crowded with ocean vessels and mighty steamers flying the penants of every nation.

Let him calculate the volume of business of several convergent railways; let him visit its crowded business thoroughfares, measure its trade and estimate its commerce; let him value its miles upon miles of solidly built streets, its magnificent warehouses, drive through the boulevards on its mountain slopes, dotted everywhere with the stately residences of its merchant princes; let him walk through its immense and various factories, visit its banks and monetary institutions, and estimate the volume of business they represent, and yet the picture but feebly describes the great commercial metropolis of the Dominion.

The night before had been a bright and happy Christmas eve in the Elliott mansion. The family consisted of Grandpapa Elliott, whose long and silvery locks had been whitened by the snows of seventy winters, whose youthful days had been spent in merry England, and who by industry, intelligence and skill in agriculture and stock farming had amassed a fortune, and established the Elliott homestead where we now find it. His son, who succeeded to the estate and farm, had received a business training was a jeweler by trade and is head of an extensive firm in business in the adjacent city. Mrs. Elliott was the personification of a happy, cheerful, contented, thrifty housewife, who was at once queen of the home, and angel of the household. She enjoyed the love and devotion of the whole household. There were two bright and happy children; Percy, a lively little fellow of ten summers, whom nurse would persist in calling "Dewdrop" ever since she had told him that his little sister, pet—named "Golden Hair," a sweet child of seven summers, had descended from the clouds a pearly dewdrop, and had been found one bright summer morning half hidden under a rose leaf in the garden.

On this Chistmas Eve, mamma had business in the town, and intended calling at the store for papa Elliott, so that they might return home together, as papa would be later than usual that night owing to the crowds of customers that were expected to be making their holiday purchases. And so it was arranged that the children were to be left at home for Grandpa to entertain with stories while nurse should finish some sewing.

"Now, Grandpapa, you must tell the children all about Santa Claus while I am gone, and when they get sleepy nurse will put them in their little beds. Now, do not sit up too late, my little cherubs," said mamma as she kissed them cheerily and was gone.

Soon they had clambered up on Grandpapa's knees, and wanted to know who Santa Claus was, and all about him.

Percy could not see how he was going to get up to the roof, as nurse had told them that he came down the chimney with lots of presents for little folks, unless James should place a ladder for him to climb up by.

And so they toyed with the old man's silvery locks, and rested their little heads on his bosom, and listened with upturned gaze while he narrated to them the wonderful story of the Advent of the native of Bethlehem, and of Good St Nicholas, Santa-Claus, as we call the patron saint of Christmas Tide.

Their little minds were all attention as the good old man lead them along through the labyrinths of wonderland.

He told how in the olden times, in an Eastern land called Palestine, the home of the Jews, as some shepherds watched their flocks by night on the plains of Bethlehem, suddenly a light shone round about them, an angel appeared, who said to the frightened shepherds, "Be not afraid, for I bring you good tidings."

"How often,"—soliloquised the old man,—"have I pondered over that scene; the simple shepherds, the helpless sheep, the stillness of the midnight solitude, the astonishment of the shepherds, the heraldic angel and his heavenly message, the attendant angelic choir, and the sublimity of that first Christmas carol which they sang. Could fancy but catch those angelic cords that floated out on that midnight hour and greeted those shepherds' ears, how grand, how sublime must the conception be. Was ever chorus half so grand or sweet as this?"

The little ones plied grandpapa with many childish questions as they sat in the ruddy light looking at the blazing of the great beech log as it crackled away in the old open fire hearth with its lionfaced fireirons grandpa had brought with him from old England.

Nurse had told them about a queer little old man called Santa-Claus who came with reindeer harnessed to a sled, and laden with all kinds of presents for little folks on Christmas eve, but no little boy or girl had ever yet seen him, while nobody knew where he lived, or when he came, or whither he went. "But, grandpapa," chimed in both little voices, you "knows eberyting, so you will tell us all the truth about Santa-Claus, won't you?"

So grandpapa began:—

"Our Santa-Claus, of whom you hear so much, my children, is a myth of the middle ages. He was called the Patron Saint of Christmas, and was supposed to be the bestower of all good gifts which any one happened to receive during that holiday season, as well as all pleasures and pastimes indulged in by the people of all Eastern countries at this period of the year.

"A tradition of the early churches traces the identity of Santa-Claus back to the patron saint of school children, a bishop of the Christian church of the fourth century of the Christian era, called St. Nicholas.

"This good bishop preached earnestly against the superstitions of his time, and so anxious was he that the children should grow up more intelligent than their seniors that he became their patron saint, and devoted much time to their instruction.

"In the later ages of the church a boy was often chosen and made a mock bishop for Christmas day and called St. Nicholas, one of his duties being to preach to the children of the congregation.

"In confirmation of the tradition that the good Bishop St. Nicholas had exorcised all evil spirits, Shakespeare tells us that at Christmas tide 'no spirits dared to stir abroad:'

'The nights are wholesome;
No planets are adverse:
No fairy takes, or witch hath power to charm;
So hallowed, and so precious is the time.'

"The customs of all old Christian communities with respect to the observance of Christmas were very pretty and added much to the importance of this holiday season.

"Not only was there much rejoicing and exchange of gifts in every household, but for days before the houses and the churches were decorated with evergreens, holly, and mistletoe.

"Every family had its Christmas tree, and no one was forgotten, for dependant from its branches was a gift for every one present, old or young. It was brilliantly lighted with waxen tapers, and laden with fruit, ornamented sugar toys, trinkets, and holiday presents.

"In Catholic communities and among the Moravians, one of the most popular representations was an altar in the centre of which was usually a manger with the Holy Child, the Virgin Mother, the wise men bowing in adoration and presenting their gifts, and the shepherds in the distance keeping their flocks, while a group of miniature waxen angels with harps were suspended from the ceiling and hung hovering o'er the scene. Even to this day the decoration of the churches with evergreens, mottoes and inscriptions is a common observance. The custom of giving presents at Christmas time is traceable back through the ages to the example set by the wise men of the east on the occasion of Christ's nativity; who, we are told, being guided by a bright particular star, which went before them till it came to and stood where the young child was, visited Bethlehem, and when they had entered in, and saw the young child, and Mary its mother, fell down and worshiped him, and when they had opened their treasures they presented unto him gifts:—gold, frankincense, and myrrh."

And so Grandpapa talked on, all the while his little hearers finding it harder to keep awake, until finally Morpheus, the god of sleep, touched with gentle fingers their little eyelids and they were wrapped in slumber.

Nurse Brown peeping in just then, after having laid aside her book, came and relieved Grandpa of first one then the other sleeping babe, and stowing them carefully away in their little cots tucked them in and made them comfortable for the night.

Farmer and Mrs. Elliott now arrived from town, and the sleigh looked like a tin peddler's van, for it was laden with gifts for the whole household.

Filling the stockings and labelling the gifts was next in order, and in this nurse does her part, jealously anxious to secure the greatest surprise possible for her little wards.

A cosy fire burned brightly in the breakfast room and the snow white cloth and curiously folded napkins of the table on which was laid out a nice hot supper, gave the beholder the impression that the women of that mansion excelled in the greatest of all female accomplishments, good housewifery, and so it was, for Mrs. Elliott prided herself on this special accomplishment.

The supper was disposed of in due course, and the old family Bible which had been placed in front of farmer Elliott was opened and he read St. Luke's account of the Nativity. This finished, Grandpapa's voice rose in fervent prayer.

It is Christmas morning, and little "Golden Hair" and "Dew Drop" are early awake, and are peeping slyly out from under the bedcovers to see if old Santa-Claus is in their room. Gathering courage they call nurse and ask her if she had seen Santa-Claus there last night.

Nurse avoids answering, and advises them to go to sleep again, as it is too early for them to rise. But not a bit of it. Dew Drop must have an answer; as usual he is persistent to the end. So nurse is at last obliged to say that Santa Claus had been there.

"Oh, did you see him? had he lots of presents with him?" and like questions in rotation follow.

Yes, nurse had seen him and he had lots of presents with him for little people and she guessed he had left some for them; "but don't be in a hurry," she said, "to get up, wait until it is daylight."

"When will it be daylight?"

"Oh, soon."

"What does he look like?"

"Well, the Santa Claus I saw looked like a man about as high as your papa, and he came in a sleigh, had another man driving him, and such a sleigh load of presents, Oh what a lot he had."

"And did he come in?" they asked with bated breath."

"Oh yes, he did," said nurse "and asked for little Dewdrops's stockings, and Goldenhair's too, and put something in them; wait, you'll see what nice things he has left for you."

So on they prattled about their Christmas gifts and before very long had concluded it was light enough for them to go on a visit of exploration.

Without waiting to dress they hasten to the fire-side where the abundance of the provision made by Santa Claus for their gratification caused them to stare in wonder and amazement for a moment or two; then began a most minute inspection and criticism of each article in its turn, discussing what they would keep, what give to mamma, papa, grandpapa, and nurse.

That was a very happy Christmas morning in the Elliott mansion. When papa and mamma appeared in the breakfast-room, the carpet was already strewn with the children's toys, their eyes were big with joy and their little faces beamed the happiness their faltering tongues could not fitly speak.

Papa soon had one on each knee, and before long it was settled what disposition sbould be made of their wealth of Christmas presents.

A parcel was made up for mamma to take to the poor children, which was what their parents most desired, as they wished to teach them to be kind to the poor. Some articles were distributed in the household, and then little Golden-Hair began to regret her liberality, but Grandpapa—ever equal to the occasion—preached them a nice little sermon that would have done all children good to hear, on the text, "It is more blessed to give than to receive," and told them a nice little story about a little fellow who always remembered the poor, and carried some of his presents over to the Boys' Home every Christmas and asked the matron to give them to some poor boy there who had no papa or mamma.

The visit to the Children's Home was made at ten o'clock and, was participated in by a number of ladies who vied with each other in making it a happy Christmas for the poor orphans there.

Exactly at eleven o'clock a short service was held by Rev. Canon Norman, the children's friend, who told them about the Saviour's childhood days and explained Christmas to their young minds in simple and beautiful language.

Service being over, the distribution of the gifts proceeded, and at twelve o'clock all was over and each returned to their respective homes to keep their own Christmas festival with their own choice-invited friends around the family board.

The Elliotts were extensively related and quite a number gathered at their Christmas dinner with them, but little Golden-Hair was the centre of attraction, and by more than one quaint old lady present was declared to be a Mascotte, whose presence should always secure heaven's choicest blessing on her dwelling.

But one was there of Gipsy blood, a Gipsy queen when young. The Elliotts had always been her kindest friend and although not making much of her, yet always welcomed her when she did appear.

On this occasion she turned up ominously about the noonday hour and after her usual invocation of blessings on the household, settled herself in the old arm chair by the kitchen fire.

When dinner was over and the conversation had turned on prognostications of the future, farmer Elliott bethought himself of the Gipsy woman in the kitchen and had her brought in for the entertainment of the company.

"Well, Aunt Esther," said Farmer Elliott, "our friends here would like to have an exhibition of your skill in divining the future. Not that they believe in fortune-telling, but merely for amusement."

"Well sir," modestly replied the Gypsy woman, "it is not for me who is a poor wandering Gypsy woman to be finding fault with the thoughts that is passing o' your mind, who is ladies and gentlemen of educashun; but if the Lord in distributing o' his gifts to his children have said to my people,—who are children of the desert, 'take to yourselves the gift of divination and warn the nations of the dangers which shall beset their way, read the stars of the firmament for it is my book, and observe the planets and their relation to the nativity of men and I will bequeath to you and your faithful posterity the spirit of prophecy to foretell, to warn, and to encourage the people of the earth that they may shun evil and follow good, and, be ye faithful;' so it is for me to speak unto you what is given me to say, you are free to think my talk the ravings of a simple child of nature or the voice of God, just as seemeth to the good. If some one of the company will cross my hand with silver I will try what I can do. Whose fortune shall I tell?"

One after another declined to be the subject of the Gypsy woman's prophecy, when at last someone suggested that little Golden-Hair should be the subject and that they should all watch her future and note its fulfilment or otherwise. This suggestion met with general acceptance, not because of any special interest in the child's future but because it furnished a means of escape from an unpleasant trap nobody wished to fall into.

So the Gipsy woman began: "Well, my little dear, my ladies and gentlefolk, this little woman was born for distinction; for much happiness in early life; for disappointment, for misery and suffering for a while, and then for comfort and prosperity. There are two ways before her; one bright like the starry band across the skies, (the milky way,) one dark and stormy like the nights of the north without many stars. This may the good Lord give her wisdom to avoid."

"She was born," she continued, "to be an heiress, and to be a great lady if she be wise enough to choose the right husband and pass by a road along which there be no valleys of humility, no sufferings, no disappointments. She will have to choose between two lovers; one will be an honest young man who will be as wealthy and successful as her own dear father. The other a son of luxury, the idol of his parents, the hope of his friends, the possessor of fiery eloquence and the admired of all who hear his voice; impulsive and enthusiastic she will have some trouble to avoid him. If he wins her she will be a happy bride, and win her he will," she said, lowering her voice to a whisper, "and just eighteen years from to-night she will be his bride. Weddings bells of joy will ring out on the crisp Christmas air. There will be a great gathering in these halls. Her parents will think their daughter a happy bride; but there will be a serpent in the flower she will wear upon her bridal bosom, and two years from that night its fatal sting will have sent her a wanderer, seeking shelter from the sleety storm and asking to be directed to the home of a brother who lives somewhere in that great city, she knows not just where, because of the estrangement her unfortunate marriage has brought about, but whose aid she will be driven in despair to invoke on behalf of her wretched husband. Her clinging child will nerve her to superhuman effort, until she will be discovered, shivering and exhausted, crouching for shelter from the wintry storm, in the porch of the very mansion in which dwells the one whom she is in search of. Returning from the house of a friend he will be her rescuer.

"She will be given shelter and refreshment. Her identity will not at first be suspected, but a something in the face, a tone in the voice, and a ring now worn by her mother, will be recognised and she will be known.

"That home will be an hospitable one, and in it she and her child will be nursed back to life from the burning, exhaustive fever that the cold and exposure has brought on. Brother and sister restored to each other by the overshadowing care of God's Providence will return together to the scene of her misery, to hear of her deliverance, by the death of the man who has brought her so much distress and misery.

"She will live to marry the man she should have at first chosen,—for it be fated for them two to marry,—and she will live to be a rare happy woman, out of all her griefs will come the sound of rejoicing, she will grace a mansion of no mean pretensions, and she will be greatly beloved, and called a queen among women, by the very man she turned her back upon years before, to give her hand to a beautiful profligate; whose star, for a time in the ascendant, burned and blazed, dazzling all beholders, only to go out in dismal night and wretched self destruction, another victim of that foul vice intemperance.

"This be true my friends. Then if you wish to save her marry her not to any brilliant star, in law or medicine, I divine not which, but one it is, I think law. For a while he will dazzle, like some fiery meteor which shoots across the horizon, only to go out suddenly and never more be heard from."

Silence pervaded the company as the Gypsy finished and waited a moment for some one to speak.

As she rose to retire, she added, "now cross my hand, good sirs, and I'll exorcise the evil, and bring in the good, and make her marry old farmer Dixon's Steve and live down here hard by, below the brook, in comfort always, as a country squire's lady should. But, as you won't, why let the fates be true, may the fairies guard her and all true Gypsies be her ever faithful friends."

"I don't believe in this fortune telling," said farmer Dixon, "its nought but a heap o' nonsense."

"Ah, yes, but," said Mrs. Singleton, "of the many who say they do not believe in it, I have known few on whom it had not a very sensible effect."

"Ah, well, as to that," said Parson Jones, "there are cases where, from characteristics and association in the young, one may forecast the general trend of a life as one can see the direction in which a vine will run if unobstructed; but as vegetable creation always tends in its growth toward water and the light, so among human beings, tendencies are always toward the greatest attraction and that will always be found to be in the direction of the greatest affection or the greatest pleasure, for these are the sunshine of our lives."

"Or, as Shakespeare says," chimed in another,

'There is a history in all men's lives,
Figuring the nature of the times deceased;
The which observed, a man may prophesy
With a near aim of the main chance of things
As yet not come to life; which in their seeds
And weak beginnings lie untreasured.'

"Or, as another writes,

'What is life! like a flower, with the bane in its bosom,
To-day full of promise to-morrow it dies!
And health, like the dew-drop that hangs in its blossom,
Survives but a night, and exhales to the skies;
How oft' neath the bud that is brightest and fairest,
The seeds of the canker in embryo lurk!
How oft at the root of the flower that is rarest
Secure in its ambush the worm is at work!'

"That is sound philosophy, and beautiful rhetoric; now apply the simile to human life," exclaimed Parson Jones.

A laugh of ridicule from farmer Dixon aroused all to a sense of the ridiculous tendency the conversation had taken, and it was dropped and the Gypsie's strange prophesies soon forgotten by all except the young child's mother, who treasured them up in her heart with strange foreboding.

But such is life, and it was much the same at Farmer Elliott's as elsewhere. The years came and went, the children grew to youth, from youth to more mature age, watched and tended by a mother's fondest care. Thus the poet sings of it,

"The lark has sung his carol in the sky,
The bees have sung their noontide lullaby;
Still in the vale the village bells resound,
Still in Llewellyn's Hall the jests go round;
For now the cradle-cup is circling there,
Now glad at heart, the gossips breathe their prayer
And crowding stop the cradle to admire
The babe, the sleeping image of its sire,
A few short years and then these sounds shall hail
The day again: and gladness fill the vale;
So soon the child a youth, the youth a man;
Eager to run the race his fathers ran."

LATE DOMINION NEWS.

Port Elgin expects to become a town in January, 1888.

The Minister of Customs recently received an envelope from Montreal containing $30 conscience money.

The first regular freight train passed over the Saskatchewan and Western Railway to Rapid City on Sunday last.

Sweetsburg, Que., has a cow which gave in one week 216 pounds of milk, from which twelve pounds of butter were made.

A fine of $400 has been imposed on the schooner Seabird, of St. John, N. B., for smuggling three cans of oil from Boston.

Some weeks ago a little son of Mr. Chas. B. Harris, of Morris, broke one of his arms, and last week had the misfortune to fall and break the same arm again.

Mrs. B. Farrow, of Mitchell has given birth to a boy, which it is stated was born on the same day of the month and the same hour of the day as his father.

While edging boards at the Eastman sawmills, a slit from one of the boards struck a workman in the eye, pierced the brain, and killed him almost instantly.

While a day-laborer was turning a crank at the top of a well in Cowansville, Que., the handle slipped, breaking his jaw, and nearly putting out one of his eyes.

St. John, N. B., merchants are threatened with an increase in the rates of insurance owing to representations made to the head offices of the insurance companies as to the water supply of the city and the efficiency of the fire department.

A thirteen-year-old daughter of John A. Gordon, of Picton, N. S., while shaking a mat out of a second storey window, fell to the ground and sustained injuries from which death resulted. The height was about 12 or 15 feet. Both the child's arms were broken at the wrist, and internal injury was sustained.

One day last week a man arrived at Bracebridge by stage and went to one of the hotels of the town. He remained at the hotel for some hours, and when he started to leave, instead of going out at the front door, he opened the cellar door under the stairs, fell into the cellar head foremost and broke his neck.

Four dog trains, with Indian runners, arrived at Winnipeg on Friday last, from Norquay House, bringing Rev. Mr. Semmens, the Methodist missonary, and three Winnipegers, who have been up north erecting a church and parsonage. Mr. Semmens has an extensive pastorate. It is 400 miles square. He reports the Indians quiet and contented, and proud of their new church.

Miss Shields, of the 15th concession of Grey township, has a foliage plant which is 2 feet 6 inches in height, and has 16 branches, some of which measure 13 inches. She has taken one dozen slips off it, and only got it last March, then a small slip about 1 inch long, She brought it about 30 miles in an open sleigh. She also has a Roving Sailor plant which measures 7 feet from the flower pot to the end of the vines.

A fatal shooting accident occurred at Owen Sound a few days ago whereby a boy named Silverthorn, aged 13, lost his life. An elder brother, while carelessly handling a revolver, not thinking it was loaded, shot his brother through the neck, causing death almost immediately. The revolver had just been brought home by a third and elder brother, who had been sailing on the Alberta. An inquest was held on the body of the deceased, and a verdict rendered in accordance with the facts.

In a late issne of Charlottetown Herald, under heading of editorial notes, the editor says—"A marriage notice appears in to-day's issue of a boy and a girl," etc., and then he asks, "Is it not time that the law permitting magistrates to perform the ceremony was repealed?" But he makes no comment on another marriage notice in the same issue of The Herald of an uncle to his niece, and that, too by a minister. Which of the two committed the greatest error—the magistrate in marrying two minors, or the minister in marrying two so very nearly related?

Acclimatization of Deer.

Viscount Powerscourt has communicated to the Zoological Society of London the results of his experiments in acclimatization, conducted since 1858 and 1859 on his estate in Ireland, of foreign deer. He had at one time alive in a park of one hundred acres, about two thirds of which was open pasture and one third wood, red deer, sambur deer, nylghaies, axis deer, llamas, elands, wapiti deer and moufflous, or wild sheep. The red deer increased and the wapiti bred, but the nylghaies died while still apparently in good health.

Accidents interfered with the success of the experiments with the wapitis, but the results, taken in connection with experiments made elsewhere, indicated that the acclimatization of these deer will be entirely practicable. The samburs declined, and died in the course of three or four years because, apparently, they insisted on staying in the shade. The elands, axis, and llamas died, or proved so delicate that they had to be taken away. The most favorable results were obtained with Japanese deer (cereres sika) which did remarkably well and multiplied without requiring other than the ordinary winter feeding. They are pronounced, after 24 years of breeding and increase, "a most satisfactory little deer; the venison when dressed is about the size of Welch mutton, and well flavored."

Our foreman being still indisposed, leaving us shorthanded, together with the usual rush of work at this season of the year, we have been unable to give the paper due care in proofreading, but, as this is the season of mirth, an occasional typographical error may not be amiss in that direction.

Anniversary Sermons were preached in the Methodist Church here last Sunday morning and evening by Rev. Jas. Gray of Toronto; both sermons were pratical, interesting and listened to with great attention. The choir did their part admirably, and received valuable assistance from Prof. and Mrs. Buntley who are singers of rare excellence; Mrs B. especially, delighted the large audience in the evening: she has an excellent and well trained voice, full clear and melodious. Collections $17.64.

The season of festivity and present giving is upon us, and many a one would be glad to send some token of remembrance and well-wishes to a friend at a distance, but the difficulty and expense of transmitting the article is a serious obstacle; we would suggest that, if your friends has resided in this district, you could not send a New Year's gift for the cost, which would be more appreciated than your local paper for '87; only $1 for the year, we paying the postage.

The annual tea-meeting at Townsend's appointment, Glenelg, took place last Monday evening. The eatables were good and lots of them, after which Dr. Jamieson was called to the chair, which position he filled admirably. The speakers were, Mr. Moffat. reeve of Glenelg; Mr. Williams, councillor, Thos. Boland, Artemesia; W. A. Brown, and Rev. Geo. H. Cornish of Markdale besides recitations &c., by local talent. The childrens choir led by R. I. Hosking furnished good music. Proceeds $30.

Chorus Concert.—Prof, Buntley gave a chorus concert on Monday evening last on the occasion of his departure after a weeks' earnest and successful music and voice drill with a class of 35 pupils of various grades from the new beginner to our best vocalists. There was a fair attendance, and the renderings showed through practical work on the part of the professor, and diligent application by the the pupils. A number of renderings by the Prof. and his better half also elicited applause, and altogether a very enjoyable time was spent. We hope it will be our good fortune to have a return visit and convention from the Ketcham Co. e'er long.

Christ Church Sunday School Christmas Tree Entertainment is arranged to take place on the Thursday after Christmas Day, Dec. 30th, in Haskett's Hall to commence at 7 o'clock p. m.

This year the old style (Dialogues and Recitations) will be dispensed with, and instead of them will be given the beautiful Operetta "Laila," which will not only have the advantage of novelty; (nothing of the kind that we are aware of having ever been performed in Markdale,) but which apart from the novelty we feel sure will delight all who see and hear it. The children will appear in suitable costumes and everything will be done to make the Operetta as real as circumstances will admit of. As considerable expences will be incurred in procuring the Operetta, it is found necessary to increase the charge for admission from the usual fifteen cents to twenty-five cents; children not members of the Sunday School will be charged fifteen cents.

I WONDER.

If McColman will now be satisfied.
Why sentiment has changed so much in East Grey in two years.
If there will be a similar change in next term.
If so, who will be the next choice.
What are Brown's chances now.
If he is not the best man of the three.
But then, it's not the man the'r after.
If ther'l be any special interest in the election of School trustees.
If a presbyterian should not be elected this time.
Just for the sake of variety.
If the two retiring teachers are to be m d shortly.
If the Methodist Christmas tea-party will be as great a success as usual.
If not, why not.
If the choir does not need a little enthusiasm thrown in.
If more preaching and not so much exorting would not do more good.
If Markdale is going to have a candidate for Glenelg Council.
If not, why not.
If Mr. Reynolds can qualifiy.
If the editor of the Standard would'nt make a good deputy-reeve,
If our authorities cannot stop the furious driving on our main streets.
Why the Standard don't give them a racket.
If it don't speak out we'l have to star another paper.

RUTH ELLIOTT;

OR,

A PROPHECY FULFILLED.

A TALE OF SOCIAL LIFE IN CANADA.

BY W. E. BESSEY, M. D.

PART II.

"Peaceful was the night
Wherein the Prince of Light
His reign of peace upon the earth began;
The winds with wonder whist,
Smoothly the waters kist,
Whispering new joys to the mild ocean
Who now hath quite forgot to rave;
While birds of calm sit brooding on the charmed wave.

But see, the virgin blest
Hath laid her babe to rest:
Time is, our song should here have ending.
Heaven's youngest teemed star
Hath fixed her polished car,—
Her sleeping Lord, with handmaid lamp attending;
And all about the courtly stable
Bright harnessed angels sit, in order serviceable."

It was a bright April morning, and the sun shone cheerily into the east windows of Villa Maria Convent, whose stately towers keep sentry on the southern slopes of old Mount Royal.

The bell for early matins had rung out on the clear morning air; the whole convent was early astir; there seemed to be unusual bustle. The Sisters were moving quietly about; each one devoted to some particular duty or directing preparations and decorations in the grande salon, for it was to be graduating day at this grand old educational institution for young ladies.

Many of the notables of the good city of Montreal had been invited, representatives of its wealth, culture, and refinement, and nowhere perhaps could one see gathered together a better representation of the old aristocracy especially—who were once the Seigniors, or landed proprietors, of the old Province of Quebec, than at one of these annual gatherings.

La Grande Dame et la filles made it almost a religious duty to attend on these occasions, and this one, it was expected, would be of more than usual interest as His Excellency the Governor General and Lady ——were to be present.

While the good Sisters and their domesties were busy with the preparations in the grande salon for the fitting reception of their guests, in another portion of the great group of buildings which make up this Convent, preparations weregoing on with noless of interest or activity. This was among the pupils. Some who were to take an active part in the day's proceedings were earnestly revising their tasks. One's voice could be heard in a recitation whose thrilling modulations fell pleasantly on the ear; another further on was taking a last look at the author from which she was to give a reading; anon two are recapitulating a dialogue; then a merry, light-hearted laugh would ring out in the long corridor as some bright young spirit would make merry with the hour.

From another half open portal poured forth sounds of music of entrancing sweetness. Listening one could distinguish that it came from the harpsichord, and that the touch was one of exquisite delicacy, and the selection a reverie of remarkable beauty. With bated breath we pause to drink it in, when almost imperceptibly the music has changed to a raphsodie celestiale, and a torrent of silvery notes comes pouring forth which carries the listener away in rapt delight. Whatever pupil that is, we conclude, is sure of a triumph.

We are asked to descend to a lower hall, and from a half open door peals forth the ravishing strains of "The Convent Bells," a selection of great beauty, which is being rendered with a masterly touch and precision that confounds our previous ideas of human capabilities of musical rendition.

We are opposite the door, may we not enter, our manner said, as plain as if we had spoken our thoughts, but anticipating our wishes the good nun who had been detailed to conduct us through the convent before the hour for assembling, motioned us to look in.

On an elevated dias, and in front of a tiara of rich sofas and chairs, stands the piano, and near by one of the sisters, the musical instructress, a foreign lady of great skill in this department.

"It was she to whose exquisite playing you have been listening," said our guide. But she is not alone; with her are three of the young lady pupils. One has a violin, another stands resting her hand upon a large, golden harp, the third, who is to perform on the piano, is receiving her last instruction and the good sister has been illustrating to them modulation, or the cadences and emphasis, to be attended to in their execution of the selection.

The pupils divide our interest between them and the grand assembly hall, for this is the grand salon of the convent.

But first of the pupils. They appear to be between the ages of seventeen and twenty; and are apparelled with rare simplicity and neatness.

The one who will preside at the piano is the daughter of a prominent member of the Bar. Her rich brown complexion, and her full, large, velvety black eyes, her regularly chiseled features, face of oval contour, and exquisitely carved mouth, her fine shaped head poised with queenly grace and crowned with a flowing mass of rich raven black hair falling in studied negligé about her finely moulded shoulders makes her at once distingue, brilliant, and attractive.

Beside her stands a blonde of singular beauty; it is unmistakably an English face; her eyes large and blue, aqualine nose, gracefully moulded features; lips, in which cupid's bow is seen, and a chin indicative of a refined taste and yielding disposition.

She is more slender than the first; tall and graceful; of quiet and gentle mien, and as she bends her head towards her golden harp and touches its chords with thrilling effect, we are almost irresistably about to exclaim, "what an angelic creature," when a finger in warning raised by the good nun who accompanies us enjoins the strictest silence

It is little Golden Hair, the child of prophecy, grown to be the sweet and accomplished Ruth Elliott, daughter of the princely merchant, and farmer, and now bank president, Mr. Elliott of Dorchester Road.

Her parents will be among the assembled guests of to-day, and they will be justly proud of their lovely daughter.

The third is the beautiful Miss Harrington. Her father is the portly senator, and head of the great milling firm of A. W. Harrington & Co., who carry on extensive operations in wheat and flour in the North-West, as well as in Montreal, counting their capital among the millions. It is the hospitable roof of her father's stately home on the hillside that shelters Sir John Macdonald, Premier of Canada. She also is bright and beautiful, but a rippling smile plays over her face, and a genial sparkle lights up her eye, which indicates her to be like her father, who is fond of good jokes, mirthful vivacious, and the life of her circle.

All the girls are her friends and interested in her success. Each performer will a pear in a solo, as well as in the trio they are now met to finally rehearse. Miss Harrington's mastery of the viola is complete, and her finesse, "although an amateur," will bear comparison with the best masters. Volunteered our conductor, "we will wait a minute or two here to allow you to hear a passage executed."

We obey, and are well rewarded for tarrying. First there is a magnificent prelude on the piano, which subsides into an accompaniment to the harpist who next renders a brilliant passage in a wondrous manner, and then joins in an accompaniment to the fair violinist whose execution and rendition of a most difficult part was a marvel of perfection, and surpassed in effect the other two; soon this changed into a trio, all proceeding together, and each vying with the others in delicacy and perfection of execution in which the lights and shades or modulations were simply entrancing.

They have finished and retire by a side entrance, and as our eyes follow them we cannot help regarding them as the living representation of the "three graces."

Press reporters are a privileged class, and have many unique experiences; but this surpassed in exquisite delight anything our reportorial soul had ever enjoyed. Strange thoughts are always suggested by strange environments; so, in this case one could not help thinking what a training school for earth born spirits in which to fit them to take their places in the great angelic chorus and orchestra of heaven.

Other pupils take their places and continue the rehearsal of their several parts, but our thoughts follow the beautiful trio, and are centered upon the English blonde, whose quiet, modest mien has quite disturbed our usual calm serenity, and we feel a strange unrest in our usually dull and calloused reportorial sympathies.

The guests are beginning to arrive and are conducted to seats in the grand salon. Soon His Excellency drives up, and as he enters, accompanied by Lady —— and his aides de camp, the pupils, who have filed in and are already in their places, two deep in the form of quarter circles at each side of the dias, all standing, join in singing a stanza of a welcome song, the company also standing.

Their Excellencies having been seated on the dias, an address of welcome is read in the English and French languages, by two of the pupils, and Lady —— presented with a handsome bouquet, by a third, of rare flowers culled from the convent's own conservatory, for which fitting replies are made by His Excellency. The programme of the day is then proceeded with, which consisted first in reading a report of the condition and progress of the institution, giving an outline of its history, the attendance for the year, the names of the graduating class, the names of prize winners, commendatory remarks or special mention of various pupils in special branches, &c., &c. This over, the list of names of prize winners was called, and as each blushing maiden advanced to the dias and was presented by the Superioress stating in what they excelled the prizes were handed to each, with a few commendatory remarks by His Excellency, marking it as a red letter day in their history. This was followed by the presentation of diplomas, and following on this, a valedictory by one of the young lady graduates on the possibilities of human attainments. It is superfluous to say that the audience was very appreciative and complimentary, and showered applause upon the successful ones. An address to the pupils by His Excellency and especially to the graduates then closed this portion of the exercises. The programme of entertainment furnished by the pupils and graduating class began.

To be as brief as possible, as our space is limited, I must with the readers' permission omit much of interest that transpired; but the performances of the "three graces," introduced as such by the Lady Superior, and indeed they well deserved the designation, as the plaudits of the audience, and the showers of bouquets fully proved, we cannot pass without remark, since it affects the future of our heroine.

First on the programme was a fantasia on the piano by Madamoiselle Loranger, the first mentioned of the three graces. This was executed with a technique and a brilliancy of modulation that evoked an outburst of applause and at once called forth the most favourable comments of the Grande Dames assembled.

Next followed a reading from the French of the poet Frechette by an English pupil, which displayed a masterly control of the French language, an accomplishment likely to be of practical service to her in future.

Next came the announcement of a selection on the harp, from Chopin by Miss Elliott, la blonde Anglaise.

In answer thereto our heroine blushingly stepped upon the raised dias; her appearance was the signal for an outburst of applause, genuine and enthusiastic.

Clad in becoming colors with a simplicity as artless as her character was earnest and sincere, she at once captivated all hearts, and at the first touch of her graceful fingers the harp strings vibrated in answering tones of wondrous sweetness; which, as she proceeded, grew more liquid, more ethereal, more sublimely entrancing. Her face became luminous as her soul rose in sympathy with the music, and beamed in every lineament of her fair Saxon face, until she appeared more like a fair visitor from some far off heavenly clime.

Her music held the audience so spellbound as to make it seem as if everybody was entranced in a reverie of absent thought, and had for the time forgotten that they, or she who ravished their ears with such exquisite strains of sweetest melody, were of the earth, earthy!

The piece being finished it was pronounced to have been a most masterly effort and elicited an enthusiastic encore. A response having, contrary to the custom, been permitted at the special request of their Excellencies, she gave on reappearing the "Traumerei" of Schumann and "Les Pleurs de Antumne," that exquisitely sympathetic composition of Rees.

These efforts were rewarded by a shower of bouqneta that fell at her feet in rich profusion, and she retired, by common consent the most graceful and exquisitely beautiful creature it had ever been their lot to see. So much pleased with the enthusiasm she evoked, was the delighted Superioress that as she retired a second time she exclaimed, sotto voce, to Lady ——"It is no marvel, she is known among us as 'la angel de la convent,' such a charm is there in her presence."

Other performers followed in dialogues, recitations, readings, &c., all marked by excellen e of rendition, so thorough had their training been. But the heart still lingered around the fair Saxon pupil.

A trio by "The three Graces" was announced to conclude the programme, and when they appeared an ovation greeted them, and at the conclusion, by His Excellency's special request, the three were presented to him and highly complimented on their attainments in the art of music, and warmly thanked for the pleasure their meritorious performances had given himself, as he was sure it had the whole company.

A distribution of special prizes for special merit followed, and again our fair heroine is found among the roll of honor as having achieved marked distinction in music, literary composition and good conduct; receiving for the last the medal, for the first being awarded a diploma, and for literary composition, honorable mention.

His Excellency in presenting the fair recipients of honors with their special prizes took occasion to remark that seldom in one's life did it occur that one was permitted to witness such a happy blending of the good and the beautiful, or in such marked degree as it had been their's to see that day; or to listen to such exquisite renderings of the most difficult compositions of the great masters, so that he might without a suspicion of flattery compliment the ladies of Villa Maria on being experts in the art of esthetic culture; and the young ladies, now closing their academical career and going forth, he hoped would fill the honored places in happy homes for which their wonderful attainments eminently adapted them. The benediction having been pronounced by the Bishop of Montreal, the grande salon became a scene of friendly confusion caused by hand-shaking and congratulations, and gradually the guests scattered and the old convent resumed its accustomed quiet.

That evening in the Elliott mansion "a few friends" gathered by special invitation to join in a welcome-home to the beloved daughter and talented and accomplished pupil of the Convent of Villa Maria. Among the guests on that occasion was the gifted and brilliant young barrister, Arthur Blackstone, who had recently been admitted to the Bar.

His college career had been one of great brilliancy; he had beaten all competitors; had won every medal for which he had competed. In his eye there was a strange brightness, and on his cheek a strange delicacy of blush, that when lighted up by animation made him not merely interesting but fascinating to the feminne observer, but to those who had the faculty to enable them to look beneath the surface it indicated the hectic flush of constitutional depravity, or what in this case seemed most probable, the outward expression of the secret vice of intemperance, (possibly acquired at college), thus far successfully concealed, and as yet not suspected by his most intimate friends; time will declare which.

This was the first introduction to Miss Elliott that he had had, for, although close neighbors, they had seen little of each other for years, and had not even spoken before, but his family had been climbing, and now, by the charm which success in money getting always brings, the Blackstones were discovered to be most agreeable neighbors and most worthy people, so they began to mingle in all social gatherings. To say that young Blackstone lost his heart on that eventful night would be to but feebly express what really did happen.

That night he dreamed of the beautiful Miss Elliott, and next morning as he walked down to his office he could think of nothing or no one else; indeed his absent-mindedness became quite noticeable. He would knock over the ink bottle, write the wrong paragraph, mix up his briefs, forget to take home with him some important paper or take some other in its place; overlook some important point in a case and thus failing to secure a missing link, unintentionally play directly into the hands of his antagonist; in short he was in love, and that seriously. He raved about her when alone, attempted to write poetry, and in many other ways displayed his infatuation to such an extent as to neglect all things else and absent himself unnecessarily,—as his senior partners thought—from his office, and led to his being remonstrated with. The true cause being suspected, he was advised that whatever became of his heart it would be in the interests of their business if he would try to keep his head level.

This suggestion was not made without some degree of asperity, and nettled young Blackstone. It had the effect, however, of recalling him from dreamland and making him diligent in business no matter how fervent in spirit he ever afterward became. His evenieg visits were soon supplemented by afternoon calls which ere long were extended without the formality of an invitation into five o'clock teas; and later on Mr. Elliott, in addressing his wife, characterized his frequent visits as "protracted meetings."

"Upon my word, Mary," said he, "you had better look after Ruth, for I fear this young lawyer means to come to stay."

Mrs. Elliott reassured her husband, for she was flattered by the attentions that were being paid to her daughter by more than one of the young gentlemen of the first families of the city.

Mr. Bently, Jr., was also one of Ruth's admirers, he was scarcely less demonstrative, although more cautious in his methods of pushing forward his advances than young Blackstone.

This seemed to him prudent, as he was a prudent business man and the junior partner in the great dry-goods house of Bentley & Son.

Young Bently was a great favourite with Mr. Elliott and his good lady, and they soon found means to let their daughter know that they would prefer that she should form a matrimonial alliance, if at all, with the old, and reputable family of Bentlys, to a matrimonial adventure (if such were proposed) with a dashing young barrister, however brilliant, but with only cheek to recommend him. His brightness, Mr. Elliott sagely objected, might soon become recklessness; besides he could not see how anybody could find nervous fuel enough to continue burning at that rate very long. He did not like oversmart men, and geniuses, as a class, had not much continuity; they were like candles of tallow and resin, being extra inflamable they burned more brightly, but were all the sooner exhausted.

But young Blackstone was a partner in the old and respectable legal firm of Catchem, Pluckem, & Cheatem; and being a firm with a large clientel, he was fairly launched on the sea of life and had golden opportunities for acquiring experience in his profession, and because of his high reputation as a student, soon became distinguished as a rising member of the Bar. He also became a popular favorite at the clubs, and was regarded by the young men of his set as a 'jolly good fellow.'

In love he proposed apace, and in spite of the strongly expressed prejudices of her parents, Ruth Elliott, in only a few months from the time of her graduation with high honors, had engaged herself to become his wife.

Young Blackstone lost no time in seeking the approbation and consent of her parents to the engagement. Mr. Elliott was somewhat surprised at so early a proposition and said that, as it was a matter that seriously affected the future well-being of his daughter it would require the greatest consideration.

Young Blackstone, having been warned by Ruth, that he might expect her father's opposition, retired exulting in the thought that his proposition had not at once been summarily rejected.

Her father called her into his library next morning, and remonstrated with her in vain. She said that she could not accept the young gentleman her father wished her to marry—as she could not love him, her heart being devoted to another; and she said she had already told Mr. Bently so and had explained to him, that, much as she respected him, and felt flattered by his proposals, yet that duty to herself, and to another who possessed her affections, forbade her accepting even his attentions.

Touched by the look of disappointment which had spread over her father's face she exclaimed, "Dear father, much as I love you, and would like to have pleased you in everything, I feel it to be due to myself to marry the man I love, and share his fortunes with him, rather than one for whom I entertain no other feeling than respect, which I would regard as dishonorable."

Seeing that she was set upon effecting this mesalliance, and that in opposing her in it, he would have arrayed against him, not only the ordinary power of woman's will, but also the unconquerable power of woman's love, which

"* * * * Is known
To be a lovely, and a fearful thing."

Solomon says of it "Love is stronger than death, many waters cannot quench love, neither can the floods drown it; if a man would give all the substance of his house for love, it would utterly be contemned."

Looking at things from the practical standpoint of worldly preferment and advantage, Mr. Elliott mused thus to himself: "I wish those Blackstones had never been admitted to our circle; this is what comes of being too sociable; I was opposed to it from the first but then one has sometimes to sink one's prejudices about caste in this country, and give way, and now I am asked to give my daughter to one of this plebian race. No, I'll have none of it. Then as a stock breeder I ought to know that the common herds often develop some ancestral trait not looked for or desired, that mars all its excellence. So with this plebian blood; it is almost sure to run to excesses one direction or another. And then there's that old Saxon proverb, come down to us from the old days when wild boar hunting was the sport of noble sires; and purse bags made from boar's ear skins, were valued as a princely trophy. 'A silk purse cannot be made from a boar's ear,' so neither can we expect ambitious plebians to be ladies and gentlemen in one generation. No, my duty is plain, I must oppose this wild venture with all the firmness I can command, even at the risk of being considered harsh. If in the end I have to yield, why I will have done my duty But what she sees in him to love I can't conceive.

"Why did she love him? curious fool, be still,
Is human love the growth of human will?

"Why cannot she see her own interests, and appreciate the difference between the Bentleys and the Blackstones; both good enough in their way, but when one has the chance to choose. Zounds! but it does make my blood run warm to think these women are so heady. Why there's the wealth. Father and son, the Bentleys must be worth at least ten millions; but what is wealth to a girl in love? And young Bentley, well, he's not a lawyer; and will never be a judge, but what's a judge without money? Why he's only a slave."

"Tho' wig and gown
Conspire to keep the monster (truism) down."

"But young Bentley's at least of gentle birth; and that goes a long way with me. When he's got the money, of course; when he's-got-the-money! There's just the difference; if he hadn't got the money, why I guess I'd let her have her way, and chance it. Speaking of blood. Why Bentley's grandfather was Bishop of Birmingham, England, when I was a boy. And who was the other fellow's grandfather? Why a common peddler, of course, and afterwards a huckster in the market. But then he saved money, his son became a railway contractor under the government, and that accounts for the sudden, and phenomenal social development of the Blackstones. Blackestone's a good enough fellow, of course, in his place; and that is in a business relation purely."

"That's just where I would like to keep him; but, confound it, if my Ruth proves heady, and as persistent as her mother; well, I suppose I well have to make a virtue of necessity; put my pride in my pocket, and welcome the whole family, see if their sire had been among the squires of old England. But if she'd a chosen Bentley her child would run no chance of ever being told that grandmother had been cook in his grandfather's family."

Ruth having returned to her father's library, after just receiving an impulsive billet-doux from Blackstone, her father resumed the controversy.

"My dear Ruth, I fear you are actuated in this matter by mere sentiment, and not by your usual good sense; but as you decide you will have to abide; for society recognises but one exit from the stage on which you are about to play part, and that is death! Mine will be the shame, the disappointment; yours the suffering, should you find in a few years that your idol has turned to clay; your hopes been blighted; and you a drunkard's wife!"

After a considerable pause, he resumed, "But you will not blame me if I should reserve the portion I had intended to endow you with at your wedding for a few years, until I am satisfied it will be safe to entrust your husband with its management; for it is quite certain, that loving and trustful as you are, you would at once hand it over to him under a false sense of duty, and instead of being used for your mutual advantage, would probably be used to hasten his own destruction."

She sat in mute astonishment, she had not anticipated being subjected to so trying an ordeal, but having a profound and filial respect for her father she did not venture to combat his fears, knowing they were inspired by his love and anxiety for her welfare however much she differed with him and would like to have swept away his prejudices, unjust as she believed them to be, as she would sweep away the cobwebs from the corner of a room.

"It may be strange news to you," he resumed, "but I more than suspect the young man you have chosen is guilty of secret tippling. Indeed I have been creditably informed he has been thus addicted ever since his student days. For this reason I deem it prudent in you own interest to withhold any material advantages he might expect to gain from this alliance until he has proved himself worthy of you and of my confidence."

Stung by her father's last remarks, showing his utter want of confidence in her judgment, as she thought, she could not restrain her indignation, and exclaimed, "How can you be so cruel? You do Arthur Blackstone injustice, but some one has been prejudicing you against him, it is some foul slanderer, some spider of society weaving his pretty web of lies and sneers, but who lies himself in ambush for the spoils. Father, you have taught me to despise slanderers, and yet you are caught by the first web they spin to blight my hopes of happiness, you remember what Pope says, for we have often read these lines together.

'The world with calumny abounds,
The whitest virtue slander wounds:
There are whose joy is, night and day,
To take a character away:
Eager from rout to rout they haste,
To blast the generous and the chaste,
And hunting reputations down,
Proclaim their triumphs through the town.
What minds in such a base employment
To feel the slightest self enjoyment."

No matter, father, I believe in him if you do not, and I will be his wife. Discard me if you choose and tell me you do it for my good if you will. I for one will obey the scripture injunction and; painful though the separation be, am prepared to leave father and brother and cleave only unto him. I shall be to him a faithful wife, because I will not perjure myself before the altar if I swear I love him above all others. Keep the money, he will not need it. He is already distinguished at the bar, and you will yet be proud of him. If the worst comes to the worst I will not return to trouble you," she sobbed hysterically, and buried her face in her hands.

"But it he should not meet your flattering expectations, my dear, ventured Mr. Elliott; "suppose the worst should come, and he should fall into drinking habits, and become reckless, what then? Suppose it should turn out that I have been correctly informed that his best efforts have been made under the influence of stimulants and that his brilliancy should be of the ephemeral type that soon goes out mid darkest night, and the place that once knew him should know him no more; or, if because he should find that I have with held your portion he should ill treat you?"

"I will endure it," she said." I will bear anything, if needs be; it is my choice for the love I bear him."

"Nonsense, child, that is all sentiment: in practical life you will learn to think differently. But I have not said all to you I wish. It is my duty to inform you that I hold in trust for you a legacy of $500,000. Would I not be betraying that trust if I placed it in peril by transferring it to one in whom right, or wrong, I have no confidence, and look upon as a mere adventurer? The interest of it it is just that you should have, and some day this will be at your disposal, as also the portion I intended for you, which five years ago amounted to $60,000, and now would be more. But I will not be a party to any foolish love-match arrangement whereby those who are not fit to be trusted with money should obtain possession of your means, and squander it in riotous living. Besides, your mother has all along maintained an insurance upon her life for your special benefit. This soon matures by limitation, for it is payable as an endowment, or at her death; when received that also will be carefully invested for your benefit. Then there is your uncle's estate to be equally divided between you and your brother who was named in his will as sole heirs.

"Now, do you not see, from a business point of view, how necessary it is to be careful of your interests. And yet you will persist against my better judgment. I know I may expect that you will; and you are young and inexperienced in the world's deceptive wiles; you will not be advised; you are in love and acting wholly from sentiment, for 'love is blind', they say, and I believe it, and 'tis also said that when a woman wills, she will, you may depend on it; and when she wont, she wont; and there's an end on it. But foreseeing what was coming I have made it my business to enquire into the habits of young Blackstone, and I am persuaded that if you are determined to persist in marrying him every precaution will be necessary to prevent him spending your patrimony recklessly; or working his own ruin and sending you, perhaps an outcast, to struggle for your existence as a poor menial in some strange city."

The ladies of the Kingston Medical College lately had fun over the high tile of one of the eminent professors. One asks another, "Why does Prof.——wear a plug hat?" and then they go off into a corner and tee-he and tee-haw over the answer as though they were not aware that this world is "a vast cavern of suffering." Do you know the answer? No. Well, he wears it "to cover his head."

A singular story comes from Bathurst, N.B., where the ship Squando was lately wrecked. It is very difficult to get men to work in her, especially at night. Queer noises were heard in the cabin of the vessel last week, which no one could explain, and the men believe the vessel is haunted. There seems to be some fatality about her. When the Squando was in San Francisco some years ago, the captain and his wife killed the first mate, severing his head completely from the body with an axe. The captain was hanged, and his wife got a long sentence of imprisonment. The new captain was subsequently killed during a mutiny, and the two following captains died on board the vessel. It was alleged by the master and sailors who arrived at Bathurst on her that she was haunted, and they left in a body. The Norwegian Consul then engaged two watchmen to look after her, but one night on board was enough. They allege that they saw a headless man walking in the cabin, that the bedclothes were pulled off them, that hand-spikes were flying around the deck, and that a cold, clammy hand was laid on their faces, and a voice told them to depart; and subsequent watchmen say that they saw a boat manned by four men hovering around the ship, which had the power of appearing and disappearing at will. The vessel is now without a watchman, as none can be found to stay on board during the night. The Minister of Customs has ordered an investigation into the cause of the wreck.

Mr. Perkins's Message.

A colored man came into a telegraph office, and shuffling his way up to the operator's window, asked: "Kin I send a telegraft f'm here to my wife out in Hollyhock?"

"Certainly," said the operator. "Can you write?"

"Sartain, sah!"

"Well, here is a blank; write your message on that."

The colored man wrote slowly and painfully for some time, and then handed the message to the operator.

"Kin yer read dat writing,' sah?" he asked.

"Oh, yes," said the operator; "I can make it out." And he read aloud, slowly:

"To MARTHA JANE PERKINS, HOLLYHOCK:

Train—done—disconnected;—home—two—A. M.—to-morrow—evenin',

GEORGE WASHINGTON PERKINS."

"You kin read it?" exclaimed Mr. Perkins. "Now gub it back to me jist one minute."

He took the message, brushed his thumb across the inky space around the ink-bottle, and then pressed the thumb vigorously against the surface of the paper.

"Here! What in the world did you do that for?" asked the operator.

"Ha! ha! Don't you worry 'bout dat," said Mr. Perkins: "when my Martha Jane see dat great big fumb dar on dis message, she know dat it was me dat sent it, shuah?"

Ambition's Bonnet.

On every politician's head
A bonnet you may see;
And every bonnet, it is said,
Is sure to have a bee.

Indeed, some bonnets have become
A very hive of bees;
And you can hear their busy hum
At any time, with ease.

The Parliamentary bee doth buzz
The loudest of the lot;
And buzzing is not all it does—
Its sting is ne'er forgot.

BRITISH TROOPS IN CANADA.

Reasons for Believing that the Red Coats Will be Brought Back Again.

A correspondent of a New York paper was told the other day by a distinguished military officer that he believed that British troops would soon again return to garrison Canadian towns from the Atlantic seaboard to British Columbia. At present the only British soldiers stationed in the Dominion are at Halifax, Nova Scotia, and all told they do not number over 1,000 men. The remaining regulars in the country are raised and paid for by the Canadians, and, including the Northwest mounted police, these Canadian regulars can muster a little less than 2,000 men. But we all know here that the Dominion Government is anxious to see British regulars once more in their old quarters at Quebec, Montreal, Kingston, Toronto and London. The opening of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the proposed new fortifications in British Columbia, the possibility of the Suez canal being closed to the British fleet, the danger of a Russian invasion of India, the half-wished-for hope of imperial federation among so many people in Great Britain and Canada, all point to the probability of garrisoning Canada with British troops in the near future. Halifax, on the Atlantic side, is to be fortified at the expense of the imperial authorities, and the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway, on the Pacific, is to be made a little Portsmouth in its way, and that, too, at the expense of the imperial treasury.

Canadian officers now occasionally go to England for courses of instruction or even to assist her in her campaigns, graduates from the military colleges at Kingston are entering the imperial army in considerable number of late, and the military relations of Canada and England are daily drawing closer. Among Canadian regular officers of British origin there is, too, a marked desire to put on the mannerisms and affect the accent of Englishmen, while among business men the return of imperial troops would be accepted as a stimulus to trade, while society people would rejoice to see the red coats once more.

Haste and Waste.

The anecdote which follows deserves to be placed beside the well-known story of the lad who won a place in a bank by stooping to pick up a pin which he found on the floor of the president's room:

One story of the eccentric Setphen Girard says that he once tested the quality of a boy who applied for a situation by giving him a match loaded at both ends and ordering him to light it. The boy struck the match, and after it had burned half its length, threw it away. Girard dismissed him, because he did not save the other end for future use. The boy's failure to notice that the match was a double-ended one was natural enough, considering how matches are generally made; but haste and heedlessness (a habit of careless observation) are responsible for a great part of the waste of property in the world.

Heroism

There is a general impression that, whatever characteristics may come to be prevalent, that of heroism must always remain exceptional. It is usually associated in the mind with prominent deeds that win universal applause, or great sacrifices that involve endurance of pain or renunciation of pleasure. To average humanity such opportunities seldom come, and it is therefore supposed that only the few can live heroic lives. Yet it is quite clear that these circumstances cannot create the heroism; they can only call it forth if it is there; and, if this be so, it must exist independent of circumstances. It is true that the heroic element in a man will enable him to do great deeds and endure great suffering if need be; but, when he is not called upon for these, he does not cease to be a hero. On the other hand, the same actions may be performed and sacrifices made without any heroism at all. It is the character that lies underneath that is heroic or unheroic.

Barnum Knows.

A few words of wisdom were dropped by P. T. Barnum some days ago, when addressing the merchants of Bridgeport, which all business men should ponder. Said he: "You do not, any of you, advertise enough. A newspaper advertisement may seldom be read, still it makes the name and the business of the man familiar and its presence in the columns of a paper inspires confidence in the stability of the enterprise." None ever advertised more liberally than the speaker, and few have reaped a more liberal return for it. Judicious and liberal advertising always pays a large interest.

Enough of a Good Thing.

"Papa, just see my new dress," said a young society girl as she presented herself attired for her first grand ball. "Isn't it too sweet for anything?"

"Does it suit you, my dear?"

"I just dote on it."

"If that is so, I should think that you would have had more of it," said paterfamilias, after taking a sharp glance at the decollete costume.

Catarrh, Catarrhal Deafness and Hay Fever.

Sufferers are not generally aware that these diseases are contagious, or that they are due to the presence of living parasites in the lining membrane of the nose and eustachian tubes. Microscopic research, however, has proved this to be a fact, and the result is that a simple remedy has been formulated whereby catarrh, catarrhal deafness and hay fever are cured in from one to three simple applications made at home. A pamphlet explaining this new treatment is sent free on receipt of stamp by A. H. Dixon & Son, 306 King Street West, Toronto, Canada.

MARKDALE, DEC. 26, 1886,

—The first car load of lumber from British Columbia has reached Montreal.

9.000 barrels of apples have been shipped from Goderich to England this season.

—There was a heavy fall of snow in Montreal last week.

—The British Columbia Legislature will meet on 24th January.

—Hon. Wm. Macdougall has been confined to his home in Ottawa by illness for some time.

An important conference of railway representatives was held in Toronto last week. The object of the meeting to arrange a uniform system of rules for the running of trains to be used in all the railroads of the country.

—One Mike Sheer was caught running a cargo of whiskey into the Northwest last week and fined $400, with six months' imprisonment at Macleod. Two policemen who were detailed to spill the liquor got drunk and each got three months with hard labor.

A GOOD FIGHT.

The Public herald, published by Lum Smith of Philadelphia, richly deserves the support and encouragement of all honest publishers as well as the honest public for its persistent and successful efforts in exposing frauds of all kinds. The public are in a great measure at the mercy of catch-penny advertisements in newspapers, pamphlets &c., and various kinds of efforts to deceive and defrand; and Lum Smith has been for ten years doing a noble, (yet in a great measure, thankless) work in exposing such nefarious peactices. He has the sympathy of the honest press of the continent, whom he has saved various amounts and endless trouble.

On Saturday last the conservatives of Centre Grey met in this village to amalgomate, if possible, the two candidates Rorke and McColman.

Over one hundred delegates were present, every township being well represented.

Considerable dissatisfaction appeared to exist as to the result of the October convention, or in the way it was conducted, but no one could give a tangible reason for said dissatisfaction. The candidates were present, and it was decided to take a fresh ballot, both candidates agreeing to abide by the decission: The voting was done under the scrutiny of a committee, who first reported the delegates present, all legally appointed, and in due time the following report announced as a result of the ballot, viz: Rorke 68, McColman 31, a majority for the former of 37. This ended the business of this important meeting with the exception of speechifiying which followed.

MUNICIPAL.

The interest in municipal matters is developing, and we may yet have "lots of fun" notwithstanding the Ontario Elections.

In Euphrasia Mr. W. J. Shepherdson is a candidate for deputy-reeve, and we are told with good prospects for success.

It is said he would have been victorous the last time he was a candidate for that office had it not been for a severe snow storm the night previous to the polling which blocked up the roads in the southwestern portion of the township where his support lay, while the other side, (below the mountain) the roads were good, thus allowing his opponents supporters to poll their votes without difficulty.

In Glenelg Mr. Jas Skene, a farmer who resides on the Garafraxa near Latona, is a candidate for deputy-reeve ond we understand Mr. J. A. McMillan is also in the field for same office. Mr. McCuaig, it is said, will not offer himself this year. Arte mesia is still quiet, as also Osprey.

Holland is fixing for a hot contest. We expect to give the result of the nominations next week.

TO THE ELECTORS OF THE SOUTH RIDING OF GREY.

GENTLEMEN.—Owing to the elections for the Legislature being sprung upon us very unexpectedly I regret exceedingly that I have been unable to visit several portions of the riding. It was my intention to call a series of meetings before the next session commenced and consult which you as to your views respecting the Franchise Bill, the excessive expenditure incurred in erection of new Parliament buildings and other important matters. I desire to briefly place my views and general policy before you, but shall endeavor to meet you at every possible point.

Elected as I was by the farming and laboring community, I challange my opponents to point to one vote opposed to their interest.

As a Conservative I shall support that party on its general principles, believing the policy of the opposition under the leadership of Mr. Meredith to be more progressive and liberal than the legislature of the present government.

The laws introduced instead of being such as everyone could easily understand are only calculated to increase litigation, a very undesirable thing for an Agricultural Province.

I am a strong advocate for manhood suffrage and shall endeavor to do away with intricacies in the voters' list by its introduction. I am opposed to any appropriation for Immigration purposes by the Provincial Legislatures.

The timber policy of the present government is opened to censure, owing to large blocks being disposed, of to the disadvantage of those whose means would admit of them purchasing small arears.

The municipal legislation I consider is calculated to take power out of the hands of the people which is legitimately theirs.

The time has now arrived when the intelligence of the people demands that greater power should be conferred on both township and county councils and by so doing the number of representatives in the Local Legislature instead of being increased as lately done, might be greately reduced.

I also believe that the Educational department should be under the control of a non-political head.

I am also strongly opposed to the monoply which now exists regarding the publication of our school books, and believe that by allowing competition, the cost of the books, to the public would be materially lessened, and by less frequent changes a greater saving would accrue to parents.

I also venture to hope that the course I pursue in connection with the Land Improvement fund was in the interest of my constituents and in the future should you do me the honor to re-elect me, it shall be my utmost endeavor to look after the interest of those whom I represent.

There are many matters to which it is impossible to allude in an address, but whil I am sensible of the honor you did me a common farmer, by returning me as your representative, I trust my course in the House has been such, as to retain your esteem and confidence.

Asking you for a renewal of your confidence.

I am gentlemen,
faithfully yours,
JOHN BLYTH.

TO THE ELECTORS —OF THE— Centre Riding of Grey.

GENTLEMEN:—

The writs for a General Election for the Local Legislature will be issued immediately.

On Tuesday the 21st day of December next, the nominations are to be made and Tuesday the 28th day of December fixed for polling.

Having received the unanimous nomination of the largest and most influential Conservative Convention ever held in the Riding, which met in October last, and having since received the most encouraging assurance of support from the electors generally, I beg most respectfully to announce that I feel it my duty to accede to their wishes and accept such nomination.

I have been a resident of the Riding for thirty-eight years. During the greater part of that period I have been, more or less, actively engaged in the administration of your municipal affairs and while occupying prominent positions of trust in your County Council I have invariably been guided by a desire to protect and promote your interests.

My long residence in the Riding and practical knowledge of the working of our municipal institutions enable me the more readily to anticipate your special requirements, represent your grievances and obtain relief from oppressive legislation. If elected as your representative, I will endeavor faithfully to discharge my duty by giving effect to wholesome legislation and will advocate a more economical administration of the finances and of the Crown domain. As there is not space in a short address to fully explain my views I shall endeavor to attend meetings in the various Townships of the Riding before the elections and there discuss in detail the various questions now before the people.

In conclusion, I shall advocate equal rights and privileges to all classes and creeds of Her Majesty's subjects. Being a resident of the Riding and like many of yourselves engaged in farming operations, our interests are identical I shall do my best to advance them.

Relying on your cordial and generous support to elect me as your representative

I have the honor to be,
Gentlemen,
Your obedient servant,
JOSEPH RORKE.

Hoping that our business relations may continue to be satisfactory and mutually profitable.

I am respectfully,
THOS. MATTHEWS

To the Free and Independent Electors of Centre Grey.

GENTLEMEN:—The time is at hand when you will be called upon to exercise your franchise in the selection of a representative to the Legislative Assembly of Ontario. The duty which you owe to your country, to yourselves and to posterity demands that you exercise that privelege with a calm and settled determination to advance the best interests of our fair Province. In the heat of party strife men of impulsive temperaments are apt to overlook the real issues involved in the LIVING present, and to allow their judgments to become warped by the mere "shiboleths" of the DEAD past. The interests of our country, the advancement of intelligence and the humanizing influence of our common Christianity demand that we lay aside the religious strifes and party contentions which have so long disturbed and distracted the National mind, and that as sons of our common country, loyal subjects of our beloved Queen, we go "hand-in-hand" together; mutually intent upon the achievement of a higher civilization, a purer morality and a more liberal christian sentiment, and while firmly maintaining our own rights, yet willing to grant the same privileges which we claim for ourselves to those of our fellow countrymen who may differ from us in creed or nationality.

With the view of giving effect to these sentiments, I beg to announce that I am a candidate for your suffrages at the coming election, and I respectfully request that all my fellow electors who share these sentiments, will by their vote and influence do what they can to secure my election.

It is proper that you should ask, and it is right that I should declare, what my opinions are in reference to the issues which divide the "Parties" in Ontario at the present time.

In the main I am in accord with the general course of legislation pursued and with the principles enunciated and carried out for some years by the Mowat administration, and if elected I shall deem it my duty in the interests of the Province to sustain the present Government; reserving of course to myself the right to judge of each measure which may be brought forward, upon its merits, irrespective of the source from which it may emanate.

I am free to admit that with all Governments there is a tendency to unnecessary extravagance—against all such tendencies I shall deem it my duty as your representative to raise my voice and exert my influence.

In reference to the school law generally, my opinion is that recent legislation has been largely in the interest of the teaching profession, and that the interest of the public which ought to be paramount, have to a certain extent been ignored.

I am of opinion that the present 'holiday" terms are too long, especially to meet the requirements of rural communities, and that some change is desirable in this respect.

Of the many important questions which claim attention at this particular juncture it is impossible within the compass of a short address to speak with intelligence and precision:

During the canvass however I purpose to discuss some of these with you at the public meetings to be held at central points throughout the constituency when I hope to have the pleasure of meeting many of you and forming acquaintances which I trust will be mutually agreeable and lasting.

I have the honor to be,
GENTLEMEN,
Your obediant Servant,
WM. BROWN.

IT SELDOM FAILS.—J. D. Cameron, of Westlake, Ainslie, Cape Breton, had inflammatory rheumatism which Hagyard's Yellow Oil cured after all other treatment had failed.

Supplement to the "STANDARD" Dec. 23rd 1886.

MR. EDITOR,—Mr. Elliott in his letter of last week rather surpasses himself—in his tirade of errors and vindictiveness—It is amusing, to see the repudiation of his, lovely associates—and yet is it not curious; that after two weeks, meditation, and may be mutual courtesies, with a visit to Owen Sound thrown in—two appear synonimously in your coulmns—with an additional cur to echo this song. But Sir I have curried animals, like these ere now; they are small ones, and, it is easily accomplished. Before I proceed however, I must make one correction—"They did not appeal to him for advice" true; rather, "I was directed to him"—you see Sir, it is a difference without much change—Elliott being, the depository and expository, of and for his born admirers—of course he dosn't like the company, but before I have done with him, others shall see of the correctness of my charges.

THAT LETTER:

Although fyled in the archives of the Courts, it still trotted along—What think you of the intelligence of a Magistrate, to use a mere school boy's logic—to prove my private letter to be a public one—When the address the subject matter, with a reference to a private correspondence. all conclusively show, it, to have been a private one. Surely, the writer of it, has the best wright to interpret.—my contention, he admits, before he misplaced it; yes put out of his hands—Pilate and Herod became friends. after Bain sued Euphrasia! and somebody had to suffer—Judas, came upon the scene. and the Township, with its chief officer. had to be betrayed and snubbed by its Deputy Reeve—Had he acted the manly part—the council of Artemesia, would have stood by him—but from the month of September until January following, this work was proceeding. and we find that he was at the letting of it, was the overseer, the inspector, he it was who issued the pay sheets—and during all this but, once he said, "THEY are going on with that work" and when he says, he made a motion, to have the sum paid, according to his report—not sir, a report by himself—the council was kept in complete ignorance of the relation he bore to it—not only then—but afterwards nor—until the evidence was taken from him in court, was it known! And why? because the Reeve, was to be made responsible by dishonorable modes for this doubly paid work—it is difficult to summons a more cowardly act of a councillor from the annals of the corporation.

Mr. Elliott also flatly contradicts my statement regarding, the celebrated "Letter—but the very questions by the solicitor, and my replies prove my statements to be correct—It being such a serious charge, I felt it my duty to write to the Solicitor in the case regarding it—here is the reply—"O. Sound, Dec. 11th, 1886. Re. Blain & Euphrasia, I am quite positive that you did not deny your signature, and do not think anything was said to weaken your evidence—I remember Mr. Creasor, made an effort to catch you about a letter written by you. But as far as memory goes, he did not make much out of it."

Signed, ALFRED FROST.

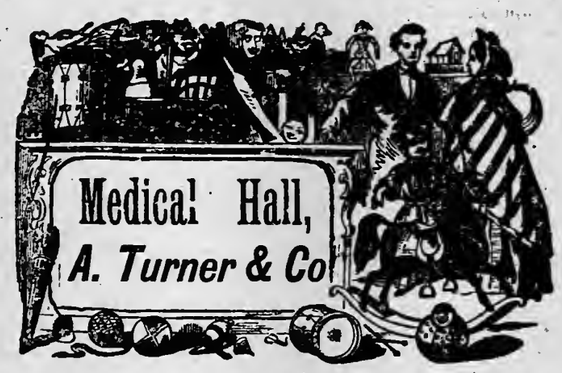
I wrote Mr. Elliott to state his charge in plain terms—But which he wishes to impress the public with, namely perjury. I am led to scorn the man, who for mercenary and base purposes, makes such gross—such malicious statements. against a man, whose shoe latchit he is unworthy to unlose—Not only Mr. Frost, but gentleman on the jury, substanciate my statements. I would have followed this, legally, but for the impecuniousness of my detractors. The Valley Road is another matter to be introduced for the first time, to assist him in his dirty work—but let us see how Elliott will answer Elliott—In 1878 upon petition by Ratepayers duly presented Mr. Elliott moved and Mr. Wright seconded—"That a committee be appointed to ascertain the practicability of the road from Plewes' mill to Campbells. This was carried—Mr. Elliott moved that the committee be formed of Messrs. Wright, Webster and the mover—They reported on the scheme favorably—When the surveying was done, according to this favorable report—Mr. Elliott moved and Webster seconded, that the expenses incurred in running the line throughout be paid whatever it was. On the 1st of September following the By-law establishing the whole line. was passed without a dissenient—Here is Elliott leading off, every motion—to discover its practicability; for the expences incurred, and for establishment—and was one of the committee—whose duty is plain, if members exceeded their instructions—The Reeve however is blamed for the thing, he so facetiously fathered—not a solitary word of dissent, escapes him—how could it be otherwise, when his committee did it—I merely assented that is all—It only remains to say—that the work is being executed as nearly as may be on the lines and upon the conditions, more than once, he advocated—much cheaper than was ever dreamed of—The cost was always placed at from $1000 to $2000 Dollar.—as to the question of Titles—It is merely clap-trap—What of other roads with which he was intimately connected, twelve years ago—and no titles yet! But then of course he was a tool of the lamented Leckie—Does it interfere with the lines, the construction or cost of the work—I fail to see it—proprietors are bound to take what three honest men will give them—but Sir there is not a road in the Township, of its length where so many titles and pledges for titles are given—only one or two lots where any doubt exists—and the road altogether is over five miles in length—He also mentions a Sullivan matter—this may be dismissed, by stating that no jury was impannelled in this case—and that therefore, Markdale is not implicated pro or con—and in the case which was tried by jury—the action was taken upon the advice of a Solicitor, and my whole course, was advised or sanctioned by this same Elliott and then, the Township lost nothing, it was not an action simply against the Township—The damage were retained out of the School Section's money in our hands—so much for consistency!

What is more deprecatory, showing the determined malice, of this Ex-Deputy, is his statement of my inviting, a neighbor to take out a license to sell liquor—I confess it would be most in consistant if I did so—but I didn't, there is the difference—I challange him to name the person or to prove it—It is inconsistent with my life long professions—and what he thinks to make out of such unmitigated falsehoods, I am at a loss to know.

I did once in my life—only once—upon the request and the pledge and honor of a ROYAL ARCH man to keep strictly within the limits of the law—Sign his Bonds. Is that wrong? I don't make it my business, nor my temperance principles don't bar me from acts of kindness to my Tavern keeping, fellow citizens—all with whom I am on the most friendly terms—Would Elliott carry out such a principle, so solmnly pledged? If his pernicious insinuations concerning myself be an indication, he is unworthy, the respect and cognizance of such an institution.

He is ill at ease regarding my favours to him—he forgets the years 1875; 1876; 1877; 1878; 1879 and subsequently when I made him the Deputy—as against other claiments—Then it was, no burden to be the tool of the Dr.—But you see Sir. I changed my practice, and he very unwillingly acquiesced—he was like the beggar who had been accustomed to receive a penny daily from his benefactor until he claimed it as a right, and when he was refused it, his benefactor was anything but a gentleman.

I am prepared Sir, to vindicate my actions; in the Council or out of it. I never assume anything of importance out of the Council Chamber whatever the decision there—it is my guide—and that is why Mr. Elliott, is so entirely circumscribed and crippled in proof of his allegations—my actions emenated from his sanction, with but few exceptions—and it shows him in a most rediculous aspect—for every time when he charges one, he is, the mover to carry out the very thing he blames one for—I admit no man is perfect, and speaking of things occurring so long ago—mistakes naturally occur—my writing, as he wrongly says, is not to gain popularity as a Councillor; although it is no boast to say I have more friends at this moment, than ever before—I have no bonus, seeking peramulating business to meet—I have the farmers interest at heart, my streneous efforts have been to keep down the taxes—for this I have been assailed by a few interested parties—but is the duty to guard the interests of 700 Ratepayers, as against the clamor and inconsistency of a few. Thanking you for the space,



I am Yours,

DR. CHRISTOE.

FARM.

Notes.

Put your best wheat in a separate bin for seed.

Do not cook good, sound, wholesome roots or grain for stock.

Sorghum bagasse makes a good mulch for raspberries and fruit trees.

Some dairymen save the last fourth of the milk from the cow in a separate vessel, and pour it directly into a cream jar.

Secretary Shaffer states that the use of pyrethum on cabbage plants to kill the worms has been attended with entire success.

It is none too early to look over the stables and chink up the cracks, nail down the warped battens and make ready for winter.

There never was a time when so many minds were at work or so many efforts made in various directions to advance the practice and science of agriculture.

White fowls when dressed for the market do not show pin-feather marks as do the black breeds. This is a point in their favor which is worth considering.

In order to guard against pleuro-pneumonia the Canadian Government recently ordered 357 imported cattle, valued at $30,000, to be slaughtered and cremated.

A good way to kill out sorrel is to salt the sheep on it. Care should be taken never to allow the sorrel to seed, as it can be carried to other points in the manure.

Sheep will eat more, be more contented and thrive better on a new than an old range. Frequent change of range for them is important at this season of the year.

Not only does the linden tree produce honey in great abundance, but its quality is regarded by many as equal, if not superior, to that yielded by white clover.

When the hurry of farm work ceases in autumn there are many opportunities to make improvements, for which the season is favorable and the time propitious.

Carelessness must give way to business managements on the farm. The farmer should study the markets and be as ready to take advantage of opportunities as the merchant.

The leaves make an excellent mulch around the roots of trees. If a few cornstalks are laid upon them they can be easily kept in place, and can be raked up in the spring.

Use the soot from the stovepipes and chimneys. It is excellent for flowers and young plants. Mix it with water, about a peck of soot to a barrel of water, and apply with a watering-pot.

Eggs from hens that have not fully molted do not hatch well. This is the season for disappointments with the hens, but much can be gained by providing warm quarters and allowing plenty of grain.

Prof. Arnold believes that there is no way in which fertilization can be so promoted as by dairy farming. Butter takes nothing from the soil that affects fertilization in the way that wheat and other crops do.

There is no reason why the wire fences of poultry-yards and around the field should not be used for grape-vines. Quite a large amount of such fruit could thus be economically grown, and the fence would not be injured by so doing.

A writer states that he had the best results keeping grapes when each bunch was wrapped in a piece of paper, packed in boxes holding one bushel, and the boxes kept in a place where the temperature did not fall below 35° above zero.

Of the varieties of ducks the Pekins stand confinement best, but they are not as tame as the common kinds. They grow very large, often reaching eight or nine pounds each, and yield feathers of a white color and equal to those of the goose.

Does Farming Pay.

If a merchant in the city is able to earn a competence of $3000 to $5000 a year he is considered wealthy by most farmers; yet this entire sum is oftimes expended in providing the ordinary comforts of living; and at the end of the year he is in proportionate progress but little a head of a farmer, who has not been compelled to pay a rent ot $1800 a year for his home, but rather has got his living from the homestead as he went along. Farm life is self-sustaining and preservative. A young laborer in the country working at one dollar per day and board, is proportionately better off and more independent than a clerk in a city on $700 a year, who has to expend $500 for a living. One can save at the end of the year just as much as the other; and if there are chances in favor of either for obtaining a good name and a competence, they are on the side of the country lad. Any farmer who can support himself on a farm comfortably, and make it pay a net income of seven per cent. on its cost is far ahead in competence of the citizen who lives in a brownstone front on a magnificent salary and has to spend it all for life and appearance.

Timely Suggestions.

There is good reason in the different habits of growth of corn and potatoes for plowing corn ground much more shallow than that intended for potatoes. Roots of corn naturally run only a few inches below the surface, seeking warmth and only such moisture as is brought by frequent rains. This indicated that manure for corn should be put on or near the surface, and that cultivation, especially late in the season, should be shallow. Corn roots extend horizontally as far as the height of their stalk, and usually run over into adjoining rows before cultivation ceases.

Wherever roadway fences are required by law they should be good ones. In fact, whether the law does or does not require that owners of stock should fence against animals on the highway, good fences should be kept up against stray cattle. Losses that will never be repaid will more than offset interest and repairs, especially on a much-travelled road. In byways where there is little travel fences along the roadside may be entirely dispensed with or a line of fruit trees be set just at the edge of the road, and wires, either barbed or plain, fastened to the trees as a protection against passing stock.

There is no place like home to the man who has to split kindlings, put out the clothes line and keep his mother-in-law's poodle free from fleas.

THE LIME-KILN CLUB.

"It am my painful dooty to inform dis club dat Brudder Arbustus Jenkins has passed from airth away," said Brother Gardner when the triangle had ceased to toll. "He was an honorary member of dis club, libin' in de Stait of North Caroliny, an' he was only fifteen cents behind on his dues. It kin not be said of Arbustus dat he was either a statesman, poet, philosopher philanthropist or scholar. He was simply an eberyday man, whe did not shrink eandwise when he got wet.

"As a citizen of de United Staits he did not go braggin' aroun' about our bein' de greatest nashun on airth, but he had a hickory club laid away fur any country which might knock de chip off our shoulder.

"As an elector, he went to de polls ebery time dar' was a chance to wote, an' sometimes whea deir wasn't, an' if he split his ticket it was bekase he was deeply interested in de matter of honest guv'ment.

"As a laborer he was worthy of his hire. When he wasn't workin' he was thinkin' fur de benefit of his boss. If de boss didn't know dis it was his own fault.

"As a naybur, he nebber borrowed coffee an' sugar w'dout makin' a mark on de tin cup, so he could return good measure.

"As a member of de community in which he dwelt he upheld de law in de daytime an' stole watermelyons under kiver of darkness, thereby settin' a good example fur de young.

"As a church member he prayed soft an' low, an' he was half a line behind all de rest in de singin'. In case he happened to be cotched wid a ham belonging to somebody else no refleckshuns could be cast on the church.

"As a husband he bossed de cabin, an' as a father he brung his chill'en up to fear de law an' respect ole aige.

"We shall hang the usual emblem of mournin' on de outer doah, an' we shall feel a bit sorry dat a fair to medium man has passed away. Dat will be all. We shan't pass no resolushuns to send to his wife, who knowed him better dan anybody else, nor will we claim dat our heartfelt sympathies go out fur de chill'en, who am probably no better dan anybody else's. It am 'nuff fur us dat we kin say Arbustus was up to the aiverage, an' dat death could have tooken a wusser man an' not half tried."

WILL GO TO HALIFAX.

A communication signed by forty-one leading citizens of Halifax was read by the Secretary. They desired the establishment of a branch club at that place, and petitioned that Giveadam Jones be sent down to found the organization and put it in good shape. Over sixty colored citizens, none of whom had ever been in jail, would be standing on the corners and await his arrival. Brother Gardner announced that the petition would be granted, that Brother Jones would be sent as soon as the moon reached her third quarter, which is the best time for securing cheap railroad fares. Brother Jones will carry a certificate of identity from the club, but for fear of accident it may be stated here that he stands five feet eleven, weighs 168 pounds, and has two front teeth out and a squint in his left eye. Whenever any one mentions persimmon to him he instinctively puckers up his mouth and gives himself away. The people of Halifax will find him modest, retiring and rather inclined to make his headquarters at a grocery where they sell two herrings for a cent and throw in a handful of crackers.

REMITTED.

Some time since Trustee Pullback was fined $8,000 and costs for introducing a religious discussion into the club. He declared that the whale which swallowed Jonah was 200 feet long, and of course Elder Toots scaled the figures down to 125, and a row was the result. Sir Isaac Walpole now presented a petition signed by seventy-eight members of the club asking that the fine be remitted. The petitioners had satisfied themselves that Brother Pullback introduced the topic inadvertently, having the subject of whaling on his mind, and that if Elder Toots hadn't jumped up and called him a liar there would have been no trouble.

Brother Gardner replied that he felt like respecting the wishes of so many petitioners, and would remit the fine, but he wanted it understood in the most solemn manner that whales must not be introduced into the club again.

SOMETHING RICH.

A telegram sent C. O. D., was received from the Hon. Emblem Spooner, of Toronto, saying that he was about to start for Detroit to deliver a series of lectures on physiognomy to colored people only.

Members of the Lime-Kiln Club would be admitted free of charge. Among other things the Hon. Emblem will convince his hearers:

That large feet denote great brain power.

That a red nose is the index of a soul which readily absorbs all that is beautiful in nature or art.

That a double-chin denotes a strong leaning towards murder.

That bow-legs and melancholy temperaments go together.

In brief, the physiognomist will knock most of the accepted theories into the middle of next summer, and all at the low price of ten cents.

AN IMPOSTOR.

A communication was received from St. Louis to the effect that "a very dashing and distinguishad-looking stranger, who claimed to be Waydown Bebee," was in that neighborhood soliciting alms for the erection of a Colored Hospital in Detroit. He walked stiff in the left leg, as does the genuine Waydown, and he drank from a pitcher at the same corner of his mouth, but there was a suspicion that he might be an imposter. Brother Bebee tried to secure the floor, but choked on a prune pit at the same time, and Brother Gardner said:

"De Seckretary will answer to de effeck dat de pusson am a base impostor, an' offer a reward of $25 fur his arrest an' convickshun. Dar' am no movement on fut as I knows of fur a Cull'd Hospital in dis city or elsewhere. I doan' see de need of one. If any of us am tooken wid fever de ole woman will fotch out her catnip tea an' hoss raddish drafts an' broke it up, an' if any one fall off his hoss-barn an' breaks a leg he's got to lie in bed 'till de hurt am cured."

Jerseyman (to Pat, who is fishing from the end of the pier)—"Hello, Pat! what sort of fish do you catch here?" Pat (with a knowing grin)—"Well, sor, to tell ye the truth, ye nivver can tell till ye pull' them up."

TYPICAL GAOL BIRDS.

A Warder Tells of Some He Has Had to Deal With.

"I must confess," added Warden Pilsbury, in answer to a question, "that there is a certin fascination to me about this prison life. Though I have had thirty-five years of it I am not yet tired. Just now I cannot recall the worst man I ever met in my official prison experience, but there is one whom I shall never forget. His name was Mortimer, and he was sent to the Albany penitentiary from Washington, D. C. His crime was murder, but he escaped hanging and got twelve years. A more desperate and cold-blooded scoundrel never lived. He had killed several people, but by hook or crook saved his neck. His face was the hardest, the most satanic I ever looked upon. The devil must have made it for his own enjoyment. There wasn't at any time anything about it but that was terribly forbidding. You wouldn't have trusted him surrounded by armed soldiers and manacled. His temper, too, was of the very worst possible uncontrollable passion. When chided for some slight fault by a keeper he would shake as if in a fit and his upper lip curl in a rage so that his teeth were shown like those of a made dog. I was always sent for when Mortimer was in that condition, and frequently he would be unable to put on his vest when told to do so. All strength for the time would leave him, but then he would become and more desperate than a wounded beast. His punishment invariably was that of being locked in his cell with reduced diet, but it would be three or four days before it would be safe to let him out. Mortimer was a typical prison bird. When his term of imprisonment had expired I sent for him and talked long and earnestly with him. 'Mortimer,' I said, 'you have spent most of your life in prison and are now nearly fifty years old. Don't you think it were better to live so that you will not again be sent here? At least, I should think that you would not like to die in prison.' He listened attentively. Then his upper lip began to curl, and he said:—'I was not guilty this time, and if I catch the fellow who swore me into this place I'll kill him!' And he meant every word he said. He left the penitentiary and I was glad to get rid of him. Two months after, in Washington, he quarrelled with his wife, and in his anger became so excited that he dropped dead at her feet. Heart disease did it.

STRONG AS A LION

"Some men cannot keep from committing crime. Another of the many prisoners in the Albany penitentiary is now in my mind. He was born a thief. Term after term of imprisonment failed to make him an honest man, but he was not a cruel fellow. On one occasion he fell very sick in prison, and, though he received the best medical care and nursing in the hospital, it was a long pull with him. Yet he recovered and gradually got back his strength. He was very grateful for the care which he had received. Soon after he left the penitentary hospital his time expired. I accompanied him to the boat as he was going to New York, and on the way endeavoured to impress upon him that it would be much better if he became an honest man. He thanked me for the great kindness which I had shown him and with tears in his eyes said he would never forget me. 'Yes warden,' he fairly sobbed, 'the first good gold watch that I can steal in New York I'll send you by express.' Stealing was a business with him, and he meant just what he said."—N. Y. Herald.

A Christmas Temperance Homily.

If all the money spent on intoxicating drink during the past year could this Christmas morning be brought in and laid on the Christmas breakfast table what wonderment it would cause!

If each man could by some mystic power place before his family this morning the amount he has spent in liquor the twelve months past, what confusion and humiliation would follow!

He no longer owes the amount, of course, but there it is glittering on the almost empty board—enough to have clothed the whole family; enough to have paid the rent; enough to have spread the table with a bountiful breakfast, and to have provided for a princely Christmas dinner. He has spent it all on himself, on his basest self, on his lowest appetites. He has nothing left of it but weakness of will, strength of brute desire, bitter memories, and what is worse—self-contempt. Alas! how weak are human resolutions! All this degradation and loss are in spite of the firm purpose and recorded pledge of a year ago.

Wife and children look at first with glad surprise on the recovered treasure. A second thought puts a shadow over every face, for they know that the money is only a memory, or, if substantial, it is a reality to which they have no right. All that treasure gone! And he did it. He who was sworn to protect and support and bless them—he of the blear eyes, the trembling hand, the bloated cheeks—he did it. What they might have had this Christmas day! Alas! alas!

But this money has no right here. Come, take it away, you who "own" it—saloonkeepers, rum-sellers—you who are well-fed, well-clothed, fattened on the weakness and wrong of your fellow-men—come and take it away. You have taken by dimes, now take it in dollars. Take it from the pale-faced wife and hungry children. Take it to your own burdened table and jolly children. Take it to fill your till and to swell your bank account. Take it—but remember the day of reckoning.

Will our young readers form habits that lead to such bondage? Or will they be free? Will they ever sacrifice manhood for rum, or honor for money? Will they befriend the drunkard by swearing eternal enmity to his avaricious enemy—the liquor-seller? Shall this crime be stopped in our land? Answer this Christmas day.

And remember the drunkard's victims on this blessed day of fun and feasting. Put into their desolate hearts and homes some of the brightness which has come into your lives.

A Proposal Sumarily Checked.

He was about to propose, but was somewhat nervous. He didn't know how to begin. At last he stammered out:

"I'm very uneasy."

"Uneasy?" she echoed. Then she added emphatically:

"I'll bet it's a flea off my dog. I've been there."

He didn't propose.

HEALTH.

To Be Well—Keep Well

The Law of Cure is based upon the same principle as the law of Prevention; whatever the disease that demands consideration we must look to philosophy and hygiene for our guidance. As in obedience to their simple suisine we find health and vigor, so in wilful disregard of them sickness and weakness are sure to appear, the pallid avengers of abused and insulted nature. They live near to "nature's heart" who take pleasure in living simply, purely, moderately, and their reward is in the strength of faculty and "many days" that make up a happy and successful life.

If one be born with infirmities of body or brain he is handicapped for the earthly race and there is reason for his complainings and failures; but he who comes upon the course well-equipped with the qualities of a vigorous manhood, and in recklessness or with a show of false pride sets at defiance the plain teaching of science and nature, eats and drinks, eats and works without regard to propriety and order at home and abroad, will suffer the inevitably just consequences of his wantonness in the wrecked body and degenerate mental functions that should make him a spectacle of warning to others. We should more earnestly recognize the fact that moral culture has much to do with promoting health and preventing one from falling into any form of morbidness. A strong sense of duty and high motives tend to keep one in the right path. The appetites and passions are not over stimulated by emotions that prompt to usefulness and keep the intellect steadily engaged in a worthy direction. While one man may have the instinct of mere living stronger than another, and so may endure more physical trials than another, yet the effect of high moral purpose is, I think, greater in promoting that balance of organization that prevents nervous friction and mental irregularity than the mere vital instinct. Honest living in view of the obligations that rest upon us as men and women, and the cultivation of health as an instrumentality in carrying out our valid purposes, must have a positive effect upon the temper and spirit of our whole nature, fortifying it against those irritations and annoyances so thickly strewn in the channel of everyday activity. Can we sympathize with those who deliberately transgress the laws of their being, whatever may be their motive? How many cultured, "hightoned" people, especially women, neglect common personal necessities, on the score of "delicacy"! inviting sickness and disease, which when it comes will be attributed to the fault of anybody but themselves. The physician with a large practice has occasion to condemn persons of this type almost daily. Health, solid, supporting, lasting health, is the reward of care and viligance, and in itself an honor to the wearer.

The Tonsils.

According to Dr. Bosworth, Professor of Diseases of the Throat in Bellevue Medical College, New York, the tonsils are not, as generally supposed, distinct organs,—like the liver or spleen, for instance,—and therefore they have no special function. In healthy throats there are, strictly speaking, no tonsils. Where they are found, they are the result of diseased action, which action may have developed only very small glands, with but trivial symptoms, or a large mass, giving rise to serious disturbance.

All gland-structures are exceedingly delicate, and liable to injury. Hence, the lower pharynx—that part of the back mouth which connects specially with the food passage, in distinction from the upper, which connects specially with the air passage—is very scantily supplied with them. Yet there needs to be a large secretion of mucus to lubricate the food passage. To meet this need, there are large collections of mucous glands on the two sides of the lower pharynx, and these it is that so often become inflamed and enlarged.

An ordinary "cold" often causes them to swell to two or three times their proper size, and to become red and angry masses. The inflammation generally subsides of itself in from four to seven days. This ailment is most frequent in children.

Sometimes there is an inflammation which is characterized by an exudation into the glands, which distends them and pours out, forming circular white patches around their mouth, or sometimes even covering the entire glands. It is often mistaken for diphtheria.

Frequently in the young there is a chronic enlargement of the tonsils. In such cases, the glands are peculiarly liable to be inflamed on exposure to cold. The enlargement tends to disappear with the growth of the body. It may indicate not a constitutional trouble but merely a local affection. It does not injure the general health, except when it obstructs the breathing, or disturbs sleep, or induces mouth-breathing, or otherwise interferes with some natural function.

In case of serious interference with health, one or both may be extirpated. The operation on children is not attended with any bleeding of consequence. The bleeding in adults is easily controlled. A permanently enlarged tonsil has lost its glandular function, and is worthless. In cases where the operation must be performed, the removal is not, as popularly thought, and as once believed even by some physicians, usually followed by any serious consequences. Yet only a dangerous or worthless gland should be removed.

Causes of Sudden Death.

A foreign journal, discussing the question of sudden death, says: "Very few of the sudden deaths which are generally said to arise from 'disease of the heart' do really arise from that cause. To ascertain the real origin of sudden deaths, experiments have been tried and reported to a scientific congress held at Strasbourg. Sixty-six cases of sudden death were made the subject of a thorough post mortem examination; in these only two were found who had died from disease of the heart. Nine of sixty-six died from apoplexy, while there were forty-six cases of congestion of the lungs—that is, the lungs were so full of blood they could not work, there not being room enough for a sufficient quantity of air to enter to support life. The causes that produce congestion of the lungs are cold feet, tight clothing, costive bowels, sitting till chilled after being warmed with labor or rapid walk, going too suddenly from close, heated rooms into the cold air, especially after speaking, and sudden depressing news operating on the blood. The causes of sudden death known, an avoidance of them may serve to lengthen many valuable lives which would otherwise be lost under a verdict of 'heart complaint.' This disease is supposed to be inevitable and incurable; hence, many may not take the pains they would to avoid sudden death if they knew it lay in their power."

STATISTICS.

It is stated that there are about 92,000,000 head of horned cattle, 36,000,000 horses, 200,000,000 sheep, and 46,000,000 swine in Europe.

The present population of France and her colonies amounts to only 47,000,000, all told, or about one-eighth of the number that owe allegiance to the British flag.

The canals of England and Wales are 3,000 miles in length, and represent a capital of nearly $100,000,000. About half of this mileage is under the control of railway companies, who have acquired the waterway for the purpose of extinguishing a competitor in the carrying trade.

The total trade of the West Indies is equal to as much per head of the population as that of Canada, and more than that of France. The density of the population (1,300,000) of these, perhaps the richest islands on the globe, is only 100 per square mile—50 per cent. less than that of Ireland, and 30 per cent. less than that of Scotland.

The quantity of coin necessary in any country depends on neither population nor trade. In Great Britain $20 per inhabitant is found enough, but in France they have $40. Two of the poorest countries in Europe—namely, Spain and Portugal—have the largest amount of metallic money compared to commerce. In London 99 per cent. of the daily payment is made by cheques. The Clearing House returns for London from 1881 to 1884 average $130,000,000 sterling daily, all done by paper.

The amount of school accommodation in England is enough for 1,924 children for every 10,000 of the population according to the cenus of 1881, in Scotland for 1,767, and in Ireland for 1,337; the number of names on the school registers in England is 1,698 for every 10,000 of the population, in Scotland 1,585, and in Ireland 1,376; the number of children at school, for every 10,000 of the population, on the day of the annual inspection in England was 1,535, in Scotland 1,398, and in Ireland 1,076; the average attendance in England was 1,297, in Scotland 1, 219, and in Ireland 960 only.

The number of Germans in the world who speak the German language and follow German customs is calculated to be at least 70,000,000. Of these 42,000,000 belong to Germany itself, 8,000,000 to Austria, 2,000,000 to Hungary, 2,000,000 to Switzerland, 1,250,000 to Russia, and 13,750,000 to other parts. Of these last 3,250,000 are scattered in the remaining European countries, 7,000,000 in the United States and Canada, and 500,000 in South America. The remnant of 3,500,000 may be divided between Africa, Australia, and Asia. No other European nation has yet attained to the high figure of 70,000,000. The great Germanic family is far more numerous than either the Slavs or the Latins.

A Dead Duffer.

Two hard-up looking fellows the other day accosted a business man on Larned street west with a request for alms. He put his hand to his ear and quietly replied:

"You'l have to speak louder, as I am deaf."

One of them yelled the request in his ear, and he shook his head and said:

"Perhaps you have an ear-trumpet with you? I can't make out a word that you say."

The one was about to try it over again, but the other plucked his sleeve and whispered:

"Come away, Jack. I struck this same old duffer last summer and he gave me a nickel and made me sign a receipt for twenty-five cents. Let's do straight business or none at all."

The pretended deaf man passed on, but somehow it didn't seem to him as if he was very much ahead.

When He Would Forgive Him.

"Did father injure your feelings last night when he asked you out in the hall?" asked a fair damsel of G street to a clerk in a drygoods store.

"Yes," he replied, in bitter, revengeful tones, "but I can forgive him that for your sake, dear."

"Then you will come again?" she asked, hopefully and brightly.

"Yes, love, I will come again."

"When, Harry, when?"

"When your pa is in the cold, cold ground, Annie."

"No sooner than that?" she asked, with tears in her eyes.

"Well," he said, forgivingly, "for your sake, I might be induced to come to his funeral."

Dead as a Herring.

A simple-minded rustic was standing in front of a store holding a smoked herring by the tail, when a bad boy from a window on the opposite side of the street shot at the rustic with a putty blower, the missile striking the hand in which the gentleman from the rural districts held the smoked herring.

The countryman placed the herring carefully on the ground and stamping its head violently three times with the ponderous heel of his boot, said in a triumphantly scornful voice: "Now, bite again if you can, reptile."

What Caught Him.

A gleam of a petticoat frill
I caught as she entered the carriage;
'Tis odd what a curious thrill
That gleam of a petticoat frill
Sent quivering through me until
I spoke to her softly of marriage—
'Twas the gleam of that petticoat frill
I caught as she entered the carriage.

A custom that has existed for four centuries is still maintained in some towns on the Lower Rhine. On Easter Monday—auction day—the town crier or clerk calls all the young people together, and to the highest bidder sells the privilege of dancing with the chosen girl, and her only, during the entire year. The fees flow into the public poor-box.

RIFT AND SPRAY;

OR,

LOVE AND VENGEANCE AMONG THE SMUGGLERS.

THE MOST FASCINATING OCEAN ROMANCE SINCE THE DAYS OF COOPER AND MARYATT.

CHAPTER XVI.—(CONTINUED.)

The moon at the moment that the lieutenant spoke became completely hidden by a mass of clouds. A double darkness seemed to fall upon the waters of the bay and the schooner rolled in the trough of rather a heavier sea than had for some time shown itself.

"Keep her easy!" sang out Mr. Royle to the man at the helm.

"Aye, aye, sir! Easy she is."

The Spray took a long tack out of the bay.

The darkness of the night now appeared to be excessive after the bright moonlight and not a particle of even the dimmest reflected light seemed to come from land or sea, until the Spray had nearly cleared one of the headlands, and then far away to westward the Lizard light was faintly visible.

"That will do," said Mr. Royle.

"What light is that?" whispered Lieutenant Green, as a strange, reddish-looking star appeared a little over the surface of the sea. "It seems to me as if it came from where we have been so recently. My night glass, Mr. Dowton?"

"Yes, sir," said the midshipman—who, much to his disgust, had been drafted on board the schooner.

The night glass was soon at the eye of the lieutenant, who took a long and anxious look at the red, star-like light in the bay. It appeared to be about twenty or thirty feet from the surface of the sea, and to be set right in the face of the cliff.

How it could be there, what sustained it, or what it meant, were puzzling questions that Lieutenant Green found it impossible to answer. Handing the night glass to Mr. Royle, he said:

"You look at it, Mr. Royle, and see what you think of it."

Mr. Royle took a long look.

"Well, sir, I don't know a bit what to think of it. The whole affair, sir, is a touch above me."

The lieutenant dived into the cabin again. The Honorable Charles Minto Gray was fast asleep.

"Hilloa! Sir—sir!"

"What—what is it?"

"I want your leave, sir, to cruise about the bay till daylight; for I feel quite certain that if we do we shall make some discovery about the Rift."

"Good Gracious, Mr. Green! what do you mean? Is it not down in the log that the Rift is sunk?"

"Yes, sir; but—"

"Mr. Green!"

"Yes, sir."

"You will be so good as to bear this in mind, once for all. Whatever is down in the log of one of his majesty's ship's in commission is and must be true."

"But, sir—"

"Is and must be true. Do you hear me, Mr. Green?—is and must be true. The Rift is sunk. Good night, Mr. Green."

"Good night, sir."

The lieutenant took his way slowly on deck and, in a low tone, he said:

"Keep her for Falmouth, Mr. Royle."

"And the red light, sir?"

"Oh! that is not down in the log! Good night, Mr. Royle—good night."

Lieutenant Green dived down below to his own cabin, leaving Mr. Royle in a state of great bewilderment in regard to the whole proceedings of the evening. However, he set the night watches and then, with his eyes fixed upon the odd-looking, little, red star in the cliff, he communed with himself after his own fashion.

CHAPTER XVII.

THE LOST SON OF THE PORT ADMIRAL.

It was not for long that Captain Morton, after he had left the little boat hut of the dead smuggler, allowed his feelings to obtain so complete a mastery over him as they had done.

A man of a more gallant spirit than he never lived, and there was but one thing that could ever shake the sincerity of his soul. Something must touch his affections before this representative of a brave and gallant people could be thrown off his balance in the way we have seen he was.

But the very idea that he had actually been in the presence of his long-lost child, the notion that he had seen and conversed with her and yet let her slip from him was too much for him and he had, on the impulse of the moment, acted as we have described.

For so many years—years which to him had seemed interminable—had he mourned over the loss of that little one, that the thought of her had become what we may almost call the morbid part of the mind of Captain Morton.

He had mourned her as lost to him forever—as dead past all hope of ever again meeting his eyes, except in Heaven—until that paragraph in the English newspaper had met his gaze, and then a new hope had sprung up in his heart and he had battled with the huge waves of the Atlantic in his yacht and reached the shores of the Old World.

And he had seen her! At least he was so told, and the death of the smuggler seemed to sanctify with truth the words he had uttered. He had seen her even as though he had seen her spirit—only for a moment, to pass away from him again.

No wonder that Captain Morton was deeply affected.

But, as we say, this excess of feeling passed away; and by the time he reached the head of the little, narrow, gorge-like pass that led down to the sea, he was himself again.

But he was very pale and his eyes were more than usually bright and sparkling.

When there, Captain Morton paused, and, pressing both his hands upon his heart, he strove to still its wild, tumultuous beatings.

"I must think now," he said—"I must think now, calmly and quietly, of all this! There must be no hurry—no flurry; but I must be calm and clear in all that I attempt to do. I will be calm!—I will be calm!"

The strong determination prevailed, and gradually his heart stilled itself, and he was able to look about him without confusion and to arrange his ideas.

Among the first things that struck him then was his broken engagement to dine with Sir Thomas Clifford, the port admiral. Then he asked himself if he should stay about the spot where he was, and make inquiry concerning his daughter, or at once apply to those who had authority to aid him.

If the latter, who could have more authority of the kind he probably would require to have exerted than Sir Thomas Clifford himself?

By placing it very close to his eyes, Captain Morton was able just to discover, by his watch, that it was nine o'clock.

The evening was still young.

"Not too late—not too late," he said. "I will seek the port admiral at once and claim his sympathy and help. There was a something in his countenance which assures me I shall readily receive both."

In fact nothing could be more prepossessing than the manner of Sir Thomas Clifford—tinged at it was with just such an amount of settled sadness as awakened all one's sympathies in his behalf, for he was a man who had evidently seen some deep sorrow.

Perhaps, after all, that was the hidden tie which drew him and Captain Morton together, and as there are many things on earth and in heaven that transcend our philosophy, it may be that these two men, from a kind of community of suffering, found themselves irresistibly drawn together.

The moment he had fairly formed the determination to seek Sir Thomas Clifford, Captain Morton shaped his course for the town, the lights of which were plainly visible as soon as he fairly turned out of the narrow lane that led to the beach.

Of the first person he met Captain Morton inquired the way to the port admiral's, and he was directed to a large house, standing in a garden, not a hundred yards from where he was. The summons of Captain Morton for admission was replied to by an old man, who had all the appearance of having been an old seaman, nor did the manner in which he replied to the questions of Captain Morton as to whether the admiral waswithin or not at all belie the supposition.

"Aye, aye, sir,' he said, "and if so be sir, as you be Captain Morton, the admiral is in a rare way about you, sir."

"I owe him many apologies, for I ought to have been here to dinner."

"That's it, sir; got ont of your reckoning mayhaps, sir, in unknown latitudes."

The old sailor, who had been boatswain on board of a vessel which had been long under the command of Admiral Clifford, led the way to the dining-room, where no one was to be seen, although there were ample evidences of recent occupation.

"Oh," said the boatswain. "The admiral has gone into the drawing-room, I take it sir. This here's the way—you make a short tack to nor'ward, sir, and then you beat up east again, and there you are."

"Thank you."

"Captain Mortin, sir!"

The old sailor flung open the door of a handsome drawing-room, which was brilliantly lighted with wax candles, and Captain Morton found himself in the presence of Sir Thomas Clifford and two ladies.

"I have sincerely to apologize, admiral," said Captain Morton, after he had courteously bowed to the ladies, "for breaking my engagement with you."

"Something that you could not help prevented you keeping it," said the admiral, "and as better late than never, I am delighted to see you now. Ben!"

"Ay, ay, sir."

"Bring the wine in here."

"Now, brother"—said one of the ladies, who looked exceedingly prim and demure—"now, brother."

"What is it, Agnes?"

"You know that it is really—anything but—hem! That it is contrary to all etiquette."

"Now, sister, do be quiet; and for heaven's sake never mind about etiquette. I was in hopes that we should not have heard that word this evening."

"I can assure you, brother, that etiquette is—Ben!"

"Yes, marm."

"You were not absolutely told to bring the wine here; it was a subject of discussion."

"Beg pardon, marm, but the admiral he said: 'Bring the wine,' and here it is."

"Yes, yes," said Sir Thomas Clifford, "that is right, Ben. Always obey orders."

"Always do, sir."

"Yes, you literal, dreadful man," said Miss Clifford, "I know you do. Would you believe it, sir, the admiral has on the lawn a horrid cannon!"

"A horrid cannon, madam!"

"A twenty-four," said Ben. "Took from the French."

"And," added Miss Clifford, "he keeps it loaded."

"Ben does," said the admiral, with a smile.

"Well, admiral," said Ben, "who knows but Bonypart may come here and try to take this very caboose, sir? And then a pretty thing it would be, not to be able to load quick enough and me single-handed, too!

"And would you believe it, sir," added Miss Clifford, "that Captain Baxter, of the—the—"

"Euryalus," said Ben.

"Well, perhaps he was. Captain Baxter was dining here and Ben spoke of the gun and how it was loaded, and Captain Baxter, who is a man that does not pay the least attention to etiquette in what he says, just happened, in his rough way, at that very moment, in speaking of the wine, to say to my brother: 'Now, fire away!' And what did this Ben do on the next moment?"

"I cannot say, madam."

"Why, he went on to the lawn and, just as I was sipping some wine, off went the gun with a noise that I have never got the better of ever since, and he broke half a dozen panes of glass in the dining-room and frightened all the town."

"Ay, ay!" said Ben, with a gratified look.

"And," added Miss Clifford, "when I remonstrated with him, a week afterward—when my nerves were a little restored—all he said, was: that he was obeying orders."

"So I was, marm." Captain Baxter said 'fire away,' and the admiral he said, 'oh, yes;' so out I goes, and bang goes the twenty-four. So it was all right."

"There, that will do, Ben," said Sir Thomas Clifford. "I do believe that you and Agnes made an agreement between you to tell that anecdote for the gratification of each other."

"O Lor'!" said Ben, as he left the room.

"Brother," said Miss Clifford, "I'm surprised at you."

"What for, now, sister?"

"Such a scandalous breach of etiquette?"

"Why! what have I done now?"

"To imagine it possible that I could make any agreement with that horrible Ben Bolt!"

"Oh! is that all?"

"All!—all! Good evening, brother—good evening, Captain—a—a—Captain—"

"Morton, madam."

"Captain Morton."

Miss Clifford, with a great rustling of an exceedingly thick silk dress, sailed out of the room.

The other lady—who had only smiled once or twice, although in a faint sort of way, during their dialogue—now spoke; and the subdued sweetness made a great impression upon Captain Mor ton.

"My sister," she said, "has some little prejudices; but she is one of the best-hearted creatures in the world."

"And here am I," said the admiral, "sitting here, and have never introduced you, Captain Morton, to my wife. Pray pardon me. Captain Morton, my dear; Lady Clifford, Captain Morton. I don't know what it is, but I feel an unusual weight at my heart to-night—an unusual weight."

"My dear?" said Lady Clifford anxiously.

"Oh, it is nothing—it is nothing. It will pass away—it will soon pass away. But—but—"

"You will excuse us both, Captain Morton," said Lady Clifford sadly; "but we are sufferers."

"Sufferers!"

Captain Morton could not but glance around him, upon all the material signs of prosperity and happiness which that costly apartment exhibited.

"Alas, sir!" added Lady Clifford, who saw the action, "it is not the glitter of wordly prosperity that will bring peace to the poor, wounded, heart."

"No—no!" said the admiral.

"I know it," said Captain Morton.

"You know it, sir?"

"Oh, yes—yes! And if you, admiral, and you, madam, will bear with me a little time, I would fain ask your advice and your aid in a matter that lies very near to my heart."

"Pray speak, sir," said the admiral; "we will be all attention. And it will only give us pleasure to aid you."

In a faltering voice, Captain Morton spoke:

"Ten years ago my little daughter—then a mere child—sailed from America in the ship Sarah Ann. From that time until to-night I have not seen her."

"To-night, sir?"

"Yes, admiral. I will tell you all."

Captain Morton then from first to last related to Admiral Sir Thomas Clifford what fragmentarily is already well known to the reader regarding the Sarah Ann and the fate of his child.

Toward the end of his narrative Captain Morton was very much affected, and so seemed to be Sir Thomas Clifford, for he rose and paced the room with disordered steps.

And when Captain Morton had told all, down to the death of the smuggler and the appearance of the young girl with the basket, whom he now believed veritably to be his long lost daughter, the admiral paused by his chair and in a voice of deep emotion he said:

"I, too—I, too, am a bereaved father."

"You, sir?"

"I am—I am!"

The admiral sat down and rocked to and fro, and he covered his face with his hands.

"My boy—my boy! My own boy! Oh, my poor boy!"

Lady Clifford trembled, but she did not weep—she did not speak.

"I grieve much," said Captain Morton, "that in detailing my own griefs, I have unwittingly touched a chord which vibrates with yours, sir, and yours, madam."

"It is accidental," said Lady Clifford.

"Quite—quite," said the admiral.

"Still I am very sorry."

"Oh, say not so, sir! I will aid you to the uttermost of my power in this, and be assured that the young girl you have seen will soon be restored to you, for it is quite evident she cannot reside far from here. I would to heaven we had as good a hope in regard to our own long lost son."

"Alas! alas!" sighed Lady Clifford.

"And yon have lost a son?"

"Yes, Captain Morton—yes. Shall I tell the captain, my dear?"

"Yes."

"It is now twelve years ago, sir, that our son—then about four years of age—was on the beach beneath the cliffs with his nurse, who no more than ourselves dreamed of danger to him, when a boat, manned by four men, ran up to the shingle and, without a word, seized upon the child and carried him off."

"Off to sea?"

"Yes. Our coast has such numerous indentations, headlands and bays that they were lost to sight in ten minutes, and when the nurse recovered from the blow that had been given her and from her fright, nothing could be seen of the boat, the men, or the child by her or by several other persons who, on hearing her cries, had flown to her aid too late to prevent the act."

"It is very sad."

"And now, sir, we have told you all."

"And for all this time has there been no news of your lost one?"

"None—none!"

"Be hopeful yet, admiral, and you, madam; for up to the time when this obscure paragraph that I have read to you met my eyes I had no hope."

"Ah! there is no such good fortune in store for us."

"Nay, do not say that. Who shall say it and with a knowledge sufficient to substantiate it?"

"You are very kind, Captain Morton, to try to give us hope, and we would fain cherish it. I will, however, now go at once with you to one of our most active magistrates and see what can be done to help you in the recovery of your daughter."

"A thousand thanks, Sir Thomas Clifford!"

It was now about half-past ten and Captain Morton began to entertain a notion that he ought to say something which should put an until the morning the proceedings in regard to his long-lost child; but the pleadings and the yearnings of the father's heart got the better of all such considerations.

"Tell me, Sir Thomas," he said, "am I not wrong to take you from your house at this time? Am I wrong and selfish, Lady Clifford?"

"Not at all, sir—not at all. I would myself beg Sir Thomas to go."

"Oh! it's quite right," said the admiral. "the night is still early, and if it were an hour later the gentleman I am about to take you to would think nothing of being disturbed in such a case as this. Ben, get a lantern. I am going to Mr. Justice Hilton's."

"Ay, ay, sir."

Ben was soon ready with his lantern, for the streets of the old town of Falmouth at that period were only lighted by a few very precarious oil lamps, which generally went out at the first gust of wind.

Ben went before to show the way, and as the admiral and Captain Morton followed, the former said:

"I don't know how it is, except that I suppose it is alwaya a relief to tell the story of our griefs to any one, but I am certainly easier in my mind since I have spoken to you about my lost son."

"I am glad to hear that."

"Thank you. And what is more strange is that a feeling of hope has come over me, such as I have never before experienced on the subject."

"Then I am more happy still."

"My own idea of the fate of my poor boy was that he had been kidnapped to the plantations, as they are called; for such things have been done. But now I feel as if I had a hope of looking in his face again."

"It is a blessed hope."

"West by south," said Ben.

"This way," said the admiral. "You cannot expect, Ben, that Captain Morton is to follow you by compass."

"All right, admiral; but it is west by south. Here we are, at the gate."

"This is the magistrate's, my dear sir; and again I assure you, that from him you will receive every possible attention."

It was at this moment that the report of a gun in the offing echoed through the town.

"Some arrival, Ben?" said the admiral.

"Yes sir. There she is."

A brilliant blue light at sea now let them see, from the rising ground on which they stood, the schooner Spray, making her way toward the harbor.

"Who is she, Ben?"

"Why, admiral, that's the schooner that has been sent out after the smuggler."

"Ah! the Rift. Yes. I asked for a schooner to be commissioned to hunt down one of the most daring smugglers and—I think I may add—pirates that has ever infested our coast. He calls his cutter the Rift."

"I have met with her, I think, sir."

"Indeed?"

"Yes; some sixty or eighty miles across the channel, and I saw the schooner likewise"

Bang! went another gun.

"There she comes, sir," said Ben, "with her best foot foremost; and, I should say, she has done her work."

"Has she a prize with her?"

"No, sir."

"Then the Rift has escaped."

"Or else she has gone down—do you see, sir—for them pirates don't like being taken, and would rather go down in blue water than be hauled up to the yardarm any day, and I don't for one blame them for that either."

The Spray fired a third gun, and then the white sail of a pilot boat was seen glimmering over the sea as it went to meet her to bring her in.

"Well, well," said the admiral, "I shall know all about that in the morning, for whoever is in command of the schooner is to report to me."

"Ay, ay, sir," said Ben. "She's had a brush with the rogues."

"Indeed!"

"Lord bless you, sir, yes. I can see she has been hit and her foremast is spliced."

"Then I hope for the best as regards that terror of the coast, the Rift; so, now for my friend the magistrate."

It was a pretty sight to see the Spray beating up for Falmouth roadstead, with the bright blue light glittering like a spirit and casting its radiance upon every rope and every spar, and far out upon the heaving sea.

VARIETIES.

As soon as a horse becomes blind, its coat, it is said, changes its normal condition. It is then smooth in the winter and rough in the summer.

Emigration from Germany of young men between the ages of seventeen and twenty-five is strictly forbidden by law; all vessels leaving Hamburg are watched by the police on this account.

Lighting the Parsees' sacred fire is an expensive and elaborate process on the institution of a new temple. Sixteen different kinds of wood in a thousand and one pieces of fuel are required to obtain the sacred flame, which is afterwards fed with sandalwood, and the cost of the process averages two thousand five hundred pounds. There are still three large and thirty-three small fire-temples at Bombay.

People sometimes seem to imagine that a bee is a kind of insect-cow, which browses upon flowers and converts the nectar into honey by a process somewhat analogous to that by which the cow converts grass into milk. A bee does no such thing. It simply taps the flower, stores the nectar in its bag, and empties the unchanged nectar into the cells in the hive. Hence, if you feed bees on syrup, they will fill their cells with syrup. Syrup issyrup all the same, whether it passes through the body of the bee or not. Hence the importance of the flower-fields on which the bees are pastured.

"Sloyd" is a a Scandinavian word used to designate a system of education which is becoming popular in Sweden and some other European countries, and which aims at establishing handicraft as one of the subjects generally taught in schools. The promoters of the Sloyd movement propose that all children in board-schools shall be instructed in such industries as modelling, wood-carving, joinery, locksmith's work, &c., so that they may acquire manual skill and taste for domestic work, and be enabled to beautify their homes at little expense. It would prepare the children of the lower classes for every kind of mechanical work, and form an agreeable relaxation to the mental labor required of the young men at the universities. Germany, Sweden, and Denmark are the pioneers of this new branch of education.

YOUNG FOLKS.

WINKLE.

BY HANS GOEBEL.

(Concluded.)

THE RAT'S REVEL

When everyone was so turned against Winkle and Nellie became her sole friend and protector, she began to make excuses for her. "I don't believe," she said, "that we give her enough to eat or she wouldn't have been driven to steal. I will see that, after this, she has all she wants," and so pussy was fed in season and out of season with everything Nellie could find, even securing the daintiest bits from her own plate.

After a while Winkle got so she did nothing but eat and sleep. There was no more chasing of birds over fences and up trees, no more running after dead leaves as they were blown along by the wind, no more frolicking with thistle down or snow flakes. And you would never have recognized the layful kitten of other days in this fat, lazy, half stupid cat, and the only excuse for her life was "Nellie loved her so."

Her favorite lounging place was in the barn on top of a box of bran close by the oat-bin, and the probabilities are that, but for her untimely end, she would soon have been too indolent to get up even that high.

There were plenty of rats and mice to hunt out in farmer Clifford's barn, but Winkle had lost all inclination for that sort of thing. Of course the rats and mice soon found it out, and many a jolly time they had making fun of her. One day when she was asleep in her accustomed place on top of the bran, a large rat came cautiously out of the oat bin and looked up at her. But there was no need for caution. She was fast asleep as usual. Then Mr. Rat turned around and said something into the oat-bin and out wisked Mrs. Rat and a whole family of little Rats. Then Mr. Rat took his fiddle and Mrs. Rat and all the little ones formed a ring around lazy sleeping Winkle. And they danced and capered about her to the music of the fiddle. Wilder and wilder grew their sport and then while they madly whirled around her they sang to a rollicking tune they had learned of some college students who visited there the year before,

Oh Winkle, Mistress Winkle dear,
Your'e such a lazy cat,
That you have quite forgottenow
To catch a mouse or rat.
Chorus—Ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha,
Ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha.

You are such a dreadful glutto
That you have grown so fat,
You are simply good for nothing,
A stupid, lazy, eat.
Chorus—Ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha,
Ha, ha, ha, ha, h, ha.

I would hide beneath a blanket,
And cover up my head,
If I were so fat and lazy,
From being over-fed.
Chorus—Ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha,
Ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha.

Here the chorus suddenly stopped, for Winkle having, for several seconds, been lying half awake, opened her eyes, and the rats, big and little, all scampered off home to the oat-bin. The last one had got safely away by the time she roused herself sufficiently to look after them. "Dear me," she said "how provoking to have those rats making fun of me and I so much bigger and stronger, and belonging to so much nobler and more aristocratic a family. And to think that they all got off before I could catch one. Never mind, I'llpay them back, I'll watch for them." And she settled herself to watch. But habit was too strong and she was soon asleep again, and the rats came out and finished their laughing chorus and then ran home as fast as before.

This time she felt so insulted that she decided to take up her quarters in the oat-bin so as to be near them and the more easily obtain her revenge. So she walked over to the oat bin and, the cover being open, went inside and lay down again to sleep. But while she slept the treacherous oats began to move and Winkle sank down, down, down. At first the sensation was not unpleasant and as she was so accustomod to lie half awake with her eyes shut for a while when roused from a pleasant nap, before she got ready to move or look around her for the disturbing influence, she was buried deep down in the oats and smothered to death.

The next morning, when Nellie went out to the barn to feed her charge as usual, she could find no trace of her. Winkle had mysteriously disappeared and though she searched everywhere she could think of, no clew to her whereabouts was discovered.

Nellie never forgot her first pussy-cat, and though she is an old woman now she still vividly remembers the pleasure and pain and disappointment in her possession. It has kept her always interested in the joys and sorrows of children, and full of sympathy with them. And to-day, as the little people, who call her "grandma," cluster around her asking for a story, "a really story, about when you were a little girl, grandma," she takes another Nellie in her lap and tells them about Winkle.

Choosing Baby's Profession.

When Jimmy Silker got home from the store the other evening his wife met him at the door looking very much worried.

"Jim, what do you think! Baby John swallowed four pennies this afternoon and I couldn't find the doctor, and I'm so frightened I don't know what to do."

"Well, brace up," said Jim, reassuringly. "I'm kind of glad it happened."

"Oh, you horrid thing! Glad!"

"Yes. You see I've been wondering for a long while what profession we would have John go into when he grows up."

"And did you just decide?"

"Yes. I think he ought to be well adapted for the internal revenue service."

She didn't forgive him for an hour and six minutes.

A Family Bereavement.

An industrious rustic went into his stable one spring morning and discovered his faithful mule in the agonies of death, he having overfed himself the night previous.

"Here's a state of things," exclaimed the disgusted peasant. "All winter long you do nothing but feed and feed at my expense, and when spring comes, and it is time to do a little plowing, you get out of it by giving up the ghost."

The dying mule raised his head and said in a feeble voice:

"Since you are such an ass, you should regard my death as a family bereavement," after which his spirit took its flight.

While the caretaker of the Methodist Church was lighting the lamps here on Sunday evening before last, a large chandelier fell, and at once the oil caught on fire. Fortunately there was plenty of assistance at hand and before the fire could gain headway the matting was torn up and thrown on the burning oil, and deluged with water, and the flames extinguished before any damage was done beyond charring several pews and blacking the walls and ceiling with smoke.—[Chatsworth News.

FREE TRADE.
The reduction of internal revenue and the taking off of revenue stamps from Proprietary Medicine, no doubt has largely benefitted the consumers, as well as relieving the burden of home manufactures. Especially is this the case with Green's August Flower and Boschee's German Syrup as the reduction of twenty six cents per dozen, has been added to increase the size of the bottle containing these remedies, thereby giving one-fifth more medicine in the 75 cent size, The August Flower for Dyspepsia and Liver Complaint and the German Syrup for Cough and Lung troubles, have perhaps, the largest sale of any medicine in the world. The advantage of increased size of the bottle will be greatly appreciated by the sick and afflicted, in every town and of village civilized countries. Sample bottles for 10 cents remain the same size.

A reliable pushing man will be put in charge with a full line of farm implements, cutters, buggies, waggons, pumps, cutting boxes, fanning mills &c. Mr. Bebee is a live business man and will make things interesting.

OUR annual School meeting on Wednesday was the most interesting one for years. Two candidates were nominated and a poll demanded. W. A. Brown and D. McDuffie were brot out and an animated contest was kept up until 4 o'clock when the vote stood, Brown 71 McDuffie 62. C. W. Rutledge was chairman and Thos. Elliott secretary, the latter was also elected as Section auditor.

POISONED.—A distressing case occurred in the township of Sydenham, on the night of Friday or morning of Saturday last. It appears that Mr. Arthur Bye, a well-known and respected resident, having an attack of colic, got up during the night to take a dose of pain-killer; but mistaking the bottle, took some liniment instead. When the mistake was discovered, Dr. Sloan was immediately sent for but medical service was of no avail, and Mr. Bye died in a few hours. The deceased was well known and had a large circle of relatives. And the sad event has cast a gloom over the neighborhood.—[O. S. Times,

THE annual Christmas gathering at the Methodist Church in this village was no exception to the rule of successful entertainments. An excellent tea was served in the spacious basement from six to eight o'clock after which the usual routine was gone through in the auditorium. The pastor presided and gave a neat address, the treasurer read his report showing the finances in a satisfactory and hopeful condition, Rev. R. I. Hosking gave an appropriate address, also John E. Richards a recitation which was well received. The Choir gave a number of choice selections, and last but not least were the "Peak Sisters" renderings which called forth hearty applause. Rev. Dr. Aylsworth who was to deliver an address was detained by the train being late so that he did not arrive in time. Proceeds $103.42

SPELLIN.—We have been repeatedly criticised for spelling programme without the last m-e. The reason why we spell it thus is because it has become custom in the best city papers as well as our most progressive rural exchanges and furthermore because it appears to us the common sense way. We do not believe in carrying about any unnecessary accompaniment, and are convinced that the m-e is no more necessary in the word p-r-o-g-r-a-m than the second g in sugar or wagon as formerly,, or o-u-g-h in plow, Custom becomes law, and while it may take years for such improvements to find their way into our standard dictionaries, it is no reason why they should not be generally used and considered proper. We do not pretend to be an authority in such matters, but rather inclined to improve and progress by every available means and to that end would court criticisms in a confidential way.

THE following is a list, in order of merit; of the successful pupils of the Markdale Public School at the Christmas Promotion Examination. I to II A. Hurey, Geo. Hill, V. RUTH ELLIOTT;

OR,

A PROPHECY FULFILLED.

A TALE OF SOCIAL LIFE IN CANADA.

BY W. E. BESSEY, M. D.

"Do be admonished, dear child; it is for your own sake that I plead with you. It would distress your poor mother very much if she knew my worst fears, but I have purposely withheld from her what I have heard about him. I would not make her unhappy by filling her mind with forebodings about your future well-being—you in whom she is so wrapped up—it would crush her and bring her in sorrow to an untimely grave. You can save us all this unnecessary anxiety if you will yield to my wishes and if you will stop e'er it be too late. And then you may marry Mr. Bently and be secured in wealth, comfort, opulence, and luxury—make our hearts glad and surround yourself with friends of the very best circles, with a prospect of a happy and successful life."

"Why do you mention Mr. Bently's name to me?" she indignantly replied. "How can I entertain a thought of another when I have plighted my vows to Arthur Blackstone to be his bride! You say I am rich—that I am an heiress—well, I know it is not for money Arthur Blackstone loves me. I am sure I never knew that I should be an heiress, and if you do withhold it all it will make no difference between us, he is so good and noble."

"You no doubt think him so; the man that wins a woman's heart appears to her a king. No doubt he fills that role to you," said Mr. Elliott.

"You are sarcastic," she said, "he is not a king, but he is my king, my own dear husband—to be, I hope!" But after a long silence, during which neither spoke, but Mr. Elliott went on writing, she ventured to say, "Excuse me, but did I understand you to say that you held $50,000 in trust for me? May I ask from whom it comes, and whether you intend withholding that also from me if I marry Arthur?"

"From your uncle, Major Elliott, who died from wounds received in the Zulu South African war. He was an old bachelor, and was serving with his regiment at Capetown when the war broke out. He had been induced by some adventurous spirits to join them in a speculation in the diamond fields, which turned out very successfully for him, in a few months changing him from a pensioner on the bounty of his friends to almost a millionaire. With his usual caution he sent the bulk of his wealth home to his bankers in London to be invested for him, and on the breaking out of the war, before leaving for the front he made a will dividing his estate among his relatives and forwarded a copy of the will to his solicitors for registration in England. The news of his being wounded arrived with that of others, and in due time his death from the spear wounds of the Zulus followed. Soon after an advertisement, asking for a reliable list of the relatives of Major Elliott, of the —th Regiment of Foot, appeared in the "Times." A copy found its way to me; the will was ratified, and £10,000 pounds sterling was the sum bequeathed to you. As to the second part of your question: As you are still a minor I shall exercise my prerogative as your parent and guardian to withhold the principal, whatever may be done with the interest, until you are of age."

Days passed, and nothing further was said on the marriage question at the Elliott mansion. Ruth pondered in her heart all her dear father—for she loved him—had communicated to her, but his anxiety about her intended marriage with Arthur Blackstone troubled her.

On his first visit subsequent to the foregoing interview she told him it was a hopeless thing for them to expect that her father would consent, for the present at least, to her marrying him, principally because he feared it might be her money and not herself, he most desired to secure.

"Your money, Ruth! Why you never told me you had money," a fresh interest new looming up in the case. The Blackstones love money, thought he, and I none the less my race, ergo, I must be a Blackstone, must not allow her to suppose that this consideration would weigh aught in the balance with me.

"No," she replied, "I did not tell you, for I did not know, nor can I tell you now that I have, for I have not, but—(sotto voce)—I believe my father has thought of giving me some—if I pleased him in my marriage," she added, "and you know he is able."

"Oh dear, yes!" exclaimed Blackstone, "able to give you half a million and not feel it, but what did you say about pleasing him in your marriage? He must consent to me, eh? Then of course he won't give you any money if you marry me against his consent?"

"Against his consent!" exclaimed Ruth, "you would not have me disowned and cast out by those who have been my friends since childhood, would you?"

"Why not, if I take you in?" replied Blackstone, "that is just what I want them to do. I don't want them to keep you after you are my wife and you remember what the Scriptures say. I forget the text, but it says, 'she shall leave father, mother, home and friends and cleave only to her husband.' Isn't that what it says?"

"Something like that?" she replied.

"Well, will you do it?"

"Oh, don't ask me, Arthur, to decide just now. Let me wait until papa is proud of you and then we shall have his consent and all will be pleasant as a May morning."

"No, I'll not wait," he said, "I want you. I don't want your money. Let him disinherit you if he chooses. What do I care, if I have you?"

"Oh, noble Arthur!" she exclaimed. "I knew you loved me for my own sake. Yes, I will be yours—but wait!"

"How long?" he asked.

"A year," she replied, "and then if papa holds out I will be of age and can please myself."

"A year," he exclaims. "Oh no, a week to my impatient soul would seem a week of years. Next Wednesday meet me with a valise of clothing, at the five o'clock train, at Bonaventure, for New York. Create no suspicion by your movements. I will make my visits less frequent, and merely call. It will be thought you are yielding to your father's prejudices, and in reply to the questions on the subject of marriage you can truthfully reply, "not just now," or "not to-day."

"Oh, Arthur, would you ask me to 'run away' to be married?"

"Oh, no," he replied, "I don't think I would exactly run, if I were you. I'd walk or ride. What is to hinder you from taking a ticket for,—say New York, and my taking ticket for, say Albany, you know; and riding on the same train? Only a coincidence, you know, only a coincidence. And then if we should chance to meet a clergyman by the way, and just for a paltry fee, and just for our convenience—as it would be more pleasant travelling as man and wife than separately—he should marry us. Why it was only an afterthought, you know, remember, only an afterthought."

"Oh, you are so clever," she stammered, "but—"

"But what?" he asked. "Weren't you ready to become my dutiful, loving, obedient wife when you told me to 'ask Papa?' Well then aren't you still?"

"Yes," she said, leaning her head on his shoulder, "but I don't like the plan of going away. How could I leave my father thus? You know what the poet says?"

"No, what?"

"Listen," she said,—

"'Of all the knots that nature ties,
The secret, sacred sympathies
That, as with viewless chains of gold,
The heart a happy prisoner hold;
None is more chaste, more bright, more pure
Stronger stern trials to endure;

None is more pure of earthly leaven,
None like the love of highest heaven,
Than that which binds, in bonds how blest,
The daughter to the father's breast."

"Well said, my love. A noble sentiment and one to admire, but love has its different degrees, that is one. You have mounted up to a higher. Let me quote a writer on my side of the question. I cannot give it to you in verse, I'll just give it in prose, the sense will be the same: 'Love hath various degrees and differs in all minds,—the tasteful can love but with taste; the delicate with delicacy; the fervent and eager with high impelled strength, and burning completeness and abandonment." Such is my love for you. There is love which once aroused—called to the surface from its tender fountain, and boiling up from its placid depths becomes like the torrent sweeping on in impetuosity, rising up against every obstacle, and surmounting with fury all the petty obstructions which envy, or cautious policy, the coldness or worldliness of men, seek to interpose to it. Love is such a grand power that it seems to gather strength from obstruction, and at every difficulty rises to higher might. It is all conquering; a great leveller which can bring down to its universal line of equaliation the proudest heights and remove the stubbornest impediments. There is no hope of resisting for it outwatches watch, submerges everything, acquiring strength as it proceeds; ever growing; nay, growing out of itself, it can thrive on humblest fare, it can scale walls; or undermine forts; ascend mountains; cross stormy deeps, or do any otherwise impossible thing to reach the object of affection. Such is my love for you."

"Then can you not wait if you thus love me?"

"No," he replied as he drew her more closely to him. "I am impetuous in all I do, and my love by impatience curbed would die. Arrange for our little journey; we will not be long away, I cannot be gone longer than a week. When we return we will laugh them out of their opposition to hot young blood like ours. Your father will be reconciled, and all will go merry as a marriage bell."

They parted. She to go to her room, he to soliloquise and congratulate himself on his scheme. "But what if she should prove wealthy after all. I've heard something of an old uncle of hers dying in a foreign part and leaving his wealth—something fabulous—to this family. Well, never mind, she's all right without a dollar—the most royal princess, so far as perfection goes in all the realm, and I'm a king in her estimation, at least she told me so. A pretty king I'd make, to be sure. Ah, well, I'm sure I don't like these briefs, this eternal quibbling we lawyers have to do. There are higher aims both in the profession and out than buying bread and cheese. Oh, it never did strike me before, why if a fellow is left a fortune, why, isn't that so much bread and cheese, so much wine and cigars, so many theatre tickets, so many race horses kept. Ehem! why, yes; and so many good suits that some other fellow who was saving and self-denying has earned for you. Well then where's the difference between marrying a fortune and having one left to you—only a legal difference, that's all, fortune all the same. Egad, I'll marry my fortune and no mistake, and then good-bye to drudgery and Cheatem's everlasting 'Arthur, have you done this? Arthur, what about that or the other?' And what an angel for a wife. As Paddy would say, 'Bedad, the gods might envy me.'"

Things went quietly on at the Elliott mansion and Ruth quietly and continuously made her preparations.

She had quite a stock of dresses, but she continued to have some fault to find with all of them and decided, with her mother's consent, to have some slight alterations, made in some of them at the dressmaker's down town. With this subterfuge she succeeded in removing nearly all her clothes. Alterations were made, but she told the seamstress that as she was about to visit some friends at a distance she would have a trunk sent to her establishment and she could fold away each dress in that as it was overhauled, and she could get it when she was going.

'Twas a bright day and Ruth had gone out early. Her mother in overlooking the house, as was her wont, looked into Ruth's room and raised the window to give it an airing. Everything was as she had left it. Her bird, Dicky, chirped to her as she passed him. On the drawers lay a half open letter. Why did she look at it? She took it up and read:

"DEAR RUTH.—Don't fail me at five this afternoon; the train leaves sharp on time, so be there early. I will be near and will saunter in at the last moment, salute you, ask if you intend travelling; say, 'Oh, how fortunate! May I be your escort? I am going in the same direction, on business!' Don't fail.

"ARTHUR."

"What! Ruth going away, and with Blackstone! What can this mean? Oh, now I understand about the dresses. I'll just send down for them, and I'll make a copy of this and send it to papa at the store. She must not suspect that I have seen this."

She carried out her plans. The seamstress said Miss Elliott had just got her dresses. Papa Elliott lost no time in driving up to the home on the hill side. "What's this?" he said as he entered the house. Mrs. Elliott put her hand on his arm and advised caution. They retired to their room to discuss the situation.

"An elopement, as sure as you live," suggested he. "I refused young Blackstone some days ago. I told her my reasons, and now, she, woman-like, would fly with him and leave the old birds and the warm nest where she has been reared and cuddled these many years. Oh, base ingratitude; I'll stop all this." Mrs. Elliott was a cautious, cool-headed, prudent woman, so she counselled prudence and merely added, "I knew she loved him, but I did not think she would go away without letting me know, but

"Love is a god
Who, as some define,
Fears nothing, pitieth none."

At five o'clock sharp Mr. Elliott stepped into the station, all clad as if for a journey, with James carrying a grip-sack. Ruth stood at the checking counter looking toward the train, and did not observe his approach. "Ah, you here, Ruth, going on a journey, eh? Why, what does this mean?"

At that moment a porter said, "Check, miss, 124689, New York, All right, mate, valise not to be checked."

"What, that trunk yours, and this valise."

"Yes," she replied in a monosyllable.

"Does your mother know? Why, you said nothing to me about this. What were you going to leave home to go to New York for without telling us about it?"

This was a turn in affairs she had not expected, so, striving to hide her nervousness, "Because," she replied, laconically, "home is not home where the heart's idol is not."

"Ah, then you were going in search of your idol, were you? Oh, here he comes." Just at that moment he caught sight of Arthur Blackstone, with a blue bag, entering the station and watched him as he approached. Blackstone, seeing he was discovered, made a virtue of necessity, and with a nonchanlant air approached, raised his hat to Ruth, saying "How do you do, Miss Elliott." And bowing to Mr. Elliott cooly said "Howd' ye do."

Mr. Elliott demaded an explanation warmly. Blackstone as cooly said, "Only a coincidence, I suppose, only a coincidence. I am going down the line on business. Miss Elliott, where were you going?"

"To New York," she cooly replied—"I am under such restraint at home since your interview with papa, that, like a caged bird, I pine to be away."

"Oh, I am sorry," ejaculated Blackstone, "I trust I have not been a disturber of the peace."

At this Mr. Elliott interfered.

"I see through all this; nice scheme, eh?" looking daggers at Blackstone, "nipped in the bud, though, nipped in the bud." And turning to Ruth, he said, "You will go with me. I shall defer my journey. James, take that valise and that trunk," pointing to Ruth's new trunk which she had purchased to pack away her dresses in at the dressmaker's. James went to remove them when a porter said, "hold on, don't touch that, that's for New York."

"No it ain't," said James, "they are not going to-day."

"Well where's the check?"

James asked Mr. Elliott for the check. He in turn asked Ruth. Ruth would not answer.

"Send for Mr. Kirkham," he said to a policeman.

Mr. Kirkham came. Mr. Elliott explained and Mr. Kirkham ordered the porter to remove the check and keep it until he got the other half.

As they drove home in a hack, Mr. Elliott said, "So you were going away Ruth?"

"Yes," she replied.

"To marry Arthur Blackstone I divine?" he added.

"Yes," she replied.

"Sans ceremonie," said he.

"No, not without ceremony," she replied, "but without hindrances and reproaches."

"Ah, well, seeing that you are set upon it I shall not oppose it any further." Oh the love of woman—the love of woman. How high will it not rise! To what lowly depths will it not stoop! How many injuries will it not forgive! What obstacles will it not overcome! And what sacrifice will it not make rather than give up the being upon which it has been once wholly and fully set!

The episode at the station had not passed unnoticed and even now had become the gossip of the city.

"But before I can consent to a union with that man, on any terms," said Mr. Elliott, "a marriage contract would have to be drawn up by my own solicitors. When he has signed that you may take your own way. I shall do nothing to mar your prospects, but will be glad to have reason to change my opinion as to your choice, and will do everything duty requires of me to secure my daughter's future happiness and welfare."

"Then, oh papa, won't you be reconciled to Arthur," she pleaded imploringly.

"I shall not oppose you any further," he said, "but I must be honest with you. I feel you are making a fatal mistake. Sooner or later you will be conscious of it."

"Don't say so, papa, don't say so," she cried, "he only takes a glass with a friend; he told me so when I asked him, and he said it was necessary to be social to succeed in his profession. Oh, father, have you not heard how brilliant he is considered at the bar? You say you have heard much against him. Have you not heard how he worsted a leading Q. C. in the celebrated case of Honeysuckle vs. Vinegar the other day?"

"Mr. Vinegar was an old gentleman who had a private residence uptown with beautiful grounds. Honeysuckle was a young man who sometimes visited the Misses Vinegar of sweet thirty-three, thirty-five, and thirty-seven. Mr. Honeysuckle had, on the mature deliberation of Mr. Vinegar, been forbidden to visit his family, believing as he did that he had designs upon one of his "three graces." The brief ran thus in substance:—Mr. Honeysuckle is arraigned before the High Court of Justice to answer to a charge of intent to commit a felony; inasmuch as having conceived an ardent passion for a beautiful rose, which grew in the grounds of his benefactor, he, in defiance of the expressed wish of the proprietor, Mr. Vinegar, has ventured to invade the privacy of his home, and carry off the flower he coveted, without even an apology for his impertinence. Of course violent measures were adopted against him—the dogs were set on him, his garments were injured in the struggle, his dignity was compromised, hence an action was brought to secure damages to person. Thanks to the eloquence of Arthur Blackstone, although not being able to recover damages, he was allowed to remove the coveted flower, which now blooms in his own conservatory, spreading its fragrance all abroad and flourishes under his care and attention."

"Nonsense, child, nonsense. Don't you see that the whole story is an allegory. That you are the much coveted flower; old Vinegar is myself (a pretty name, to be sure), and your own heart the judge before whom the case was argued, and of course he has won the case and you will grant the decree. Don't you see?"

"Yes, I understand, but is it fair to put it in that way? And yet it was clever anyway to have thought out so pretty an allegory."

As she started to leave the room,—"Ruth," called her father, as she reached the door. She paused. "You may tell Mr. Blackstone when you see him that I will instruct my solicitors to prepare a marriage contract on such terms as I only can consent to the marriage taking place. If he accepts the terms it is well; the arrangements can go on, if not this business must end. You need not tell him anything about your position financially. I prefer you should not now—it would be better in case your engagement should be broken off—do you understand?"

"I do, papa, and will observe your wishes religiously."

"Good morning, my child."

"Good morning, papa," and she was gone.

No further opposition was offered by Mr. Elliott, who resolved, having done his duty, to leave things to take their course.

Musing he thought, "Well, Blackstone will have his destiny in his own hands and he can frame it at his will. No man ever had a better chance, and I am sure none ever had a better wife,

"Man is his own star, and the soul that can,
Render an honest and a perfect man,
Command all light, all influence, all fate,
Nothing to him falls early or too late,
Our acts our angels are, in good or ill,
Our fatal shadows that walk by us still.

"A letter from Messrs. Abbott, Wotherspoon, McMaster & Hutchinson, sir," said his clerk next day as he han ed it to Mr. Elliott. "I thought it might be urgent, so I left it on your desk."

"Hem, yes,—well, you see, Mr. Donaldson, I have a delicate matter on hand and I wished to consult Mr. Abbott personally on the matter, but I find he has gone to England with Stephens on that blessed Pacific Railway business. Fact is, I wish to arrange a marriage contract. My daughter is set on marrying that young lawyer Blackstone."

"Blackstone!" exclaimed Mr. Donaldson.

"Yes, Blackstone. Why, what makes you look so astonished?"

"Well, nothing, but does she know much about him—does she know his habits?"

"Exactly, what about his habits?"

"Nothing favorable, Mr. Elliott, but if you are going to settle the matter by contract, it may not be so bad, you know."

"Donaldson, you make me uncomfortable. What do you know about this man?"

"Nothing good—well, nothing very bad, either, but I'll be giggered if I'd let him have my daughter, and she's no heiress, but only a poor, decent, honest girl. He'd drive her into the street in a twelve-month, or put her under the sod—that's only my opinion, however, you know."

Mr. Hutchinson, one of the great leading firm of solicitors, already alluded to, walked in, in answer to a telephone call.

"Ah, Mr. H.—I was desirous of having a contract of marriage drawn up between my daughter and Mr. Blackstone, barrister, who are under engagement of marriage.

"You don't mean—"

"I don't mean what I say? Well, that's just what I do mean, and I propose to prevent the said Mr. Blackstone, at all, from obtaining control of my daughter's means, that's what I mean, d'ye see?"

"But you don't suppose that even should you give a woman absolute control of her own means that that will prevent her husband obtaining it from her if he has enough influence over her, and squandering it if he is so disposed?"

"Well, I will have done my duty, at any rate, and that is something to console one's self with the thought of, should the alliance not prove a prosperous one."

"Prosperous? You might as well let her mount a wild horse of the plain, or bind her to it, like another Mazeppa; and expect her to be prosperous, as to marry her to a man like Blackstone and expect him not to make a shipwreck of everything in a very brief time.

The document was drawn up in due course and an appointment made with the principals to meet in the private office of Mr. Elliott to have it executed.

As Mr. Elliott expected, Blackstone was quite taken aback by the proposal, and suggested one or two amendments—in the interests of Miss Elliott, of course—he was very anxious that his motives should not be misinterpreted.

Every equivocation, however, was so promptly met by Mr. Hutchinson and Mr. Elliott, showing some considerable impatience—notwithstanding the presence of his wife and daughter—Blackstone ceased his captious opposition and the instrument was executed, that was, signed, witnessed, and registered in due course, making Ruth Elliott mistress of her own fortune, therefore entirely independent as to property.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Expression of Sympathy.

There are times when we all sorely need a word of sympathy—when all brave men and women are the better for it. By little and little the load is increased; in the same way it may likewise be lessened. Encouragment possesses a marvellous vein of recreating power; wisely administered, it counteracts the disheartening influence which a sense of baffled plans and repeated failures tends to induce; by aid of the cheery, kindly word one is enabled to pull oneself up again, and to go on with renewed efforts.

The Divisions of the Year, and Their Historic Significance.

The names and duration of the months, as we use them, were settled upon in the time of Julius Cæsar, 46 B. C., who corrected the calendar as he found it, with the aid of the philosopher Sosigenes. He has given us a measure of the year which seems to be as near perfect as the subject seems capable; i. e., the Julian period.

Dividing the year into twelve, he gave thirty-one days to every second month, beginning with January, and thirty days to the intervening months, except February, which was left with twenty-nine; but this month was given the extra day every fourth year.

But as errors cropped out, such as the multiplication of hours and minutes, not possible to be added to the month, Pope Gregory, in 1582, made the month ten days later, so that the 15th of November was written the 25th of November; and, to further rectify possible errors, he ordered that in the first year of every century, or the years 1600, 1700, 1800 and 1900, leap year is not to be kept. This system is termed the Gregorian period.

In Catholic countries the Gregorian period was at once used, but not in Protestant countries until some time after; and in Great Britain the style was changed from the Julian to the Gregorian as late as the year 1752, for the discrepancy at that date had become eleven days. An act of Parliament that year, however, altered the reckoning so that the 3d of September was changed to the 14th.

In Italy, Spain, France, Holland, and Germany, the Roman calendar is now used as amended by Pope Gregory XIII. In Russia alone, of civilized countries, is the old or Julian style continued.

Our Anglo-Saxon forefathers used a common appellative for their months, such as Os-Monath for April, as the season that the east winds prevailed; a custom not entirely unknown to the peasants of some parts of Germany and Holland at the present time.

January was so called after Janus, the deity who presided over gates, who is represented as having two heads, each looking in an opposite direction. He is supposed to regard the past and the year to come, as January was the first month in the revised year.

February, from Februare to purify, so named from the religious expiations and purifying ceremonies which took place on the commencement of this month, in ancient Rome.

March was dedicated to their god of war, Mars, who, naturally, was one of their principal deities, as the Romans were always a warlike people, and continually in the field both at home and abroad.

April, by some supposed to have been derived from Aperio, I open, as marking the budding out of nature; and by others, from the festival Aphrillis, founded on the Greek name of Venus, Aphrodite, as the first day of this month was set apart for her worship.

May, celled Maius, in honor of the senate, or Maiores, in the original constitution or legislature of Rome.

June was named in honor of the Juniores, the inferior or junior branch of the legislature.

July, originally Quintilis, or fifth month, was named Julius, after his death, by his friend Marc Antony, in honor of the family name of Cæsar, and selected perhaps on account of the fierceness of the sun's rays during this month, conquering the year as did Cæsar the world.

August, the name of sextilis, or sixth month, was changed by Augustus Cæsar, not from his having been born during this month, but through vanity. Not wishing to be outdone by Julius Cæsar, he added a day to the next month, which hitherto had but thirty, taking it from February, the one month that could least afford it.

September, the seventh; October, the eighth; November, the ninth, and December, the tenth month, are taken from the old Alban calendar, that had but ten months. This was changed by Julius Cæsar, who added two more divisions of the year, but retained some of the old names of the months.

The twelve constellations of the Zodiac were invented by Hipparchus, an astronomer and mathematician of Bithynia, Greece, who died in the year 125 B.C. These constellations are groups of fixed stars, whose outlines, in a way, represent figures of men, animals, etc., and are used in astronomical calculations.

The Egyptian, Turkish, and Hebrew lists of months are used at the present day; the Turkish are more particularly Mohammedan. These three systems are arranged so that an intercalary month is necessary at certain periods, to rectify errors in computing time.

The Indians of North America reckon their time by the moon's fulling; and though no definite term for the year is used, still an approximate calculation can be made of time, by their using the word "moon;" as, "the moon of the Buffalo," meaning our month of November; or, "twenty moons have gone;" i. e., nineteen or twenty months ago.

The signs in the small circles in our illustrations, generally accompanying the signs of the Zodiac, and inserted in a column of our common calendars under the heading of "moon's place," are derived from the hieroglyphics of the ancient Egyptians, and signify the months or divisions of the year from which their labors in the field were computed.

The parts of the body that are given in the several months, copied for an old Farmers' Almanack, were held by ancient ladies in great esteem, as many acts in their domestic and family affairs were carried out in accordance with the appearance of their accompanying signs in the aforesaid column of the calendar; as, for instance: a child might not be weaned, on when the sign cancer (66) was opposite the day appointed:—superstition, but they would have been greatly offended had any one said so.

The jewel, or precious stone, and the flower are given for each month, and are from the best English authorities. In regard to December, there is a difference of opinion: some consider the turquoise the jewel of that month. The flowers given usually bloom during these months in England, and though they may not exactly correspond with the habits of our American flowers, no more do they, in some cases, with French or Spanish; still they are considerd the best emblems of the months in the universal language of flowers.

A little arithmetic shows that a mince pie suitable for the Bartholdi Goddess of Liberty's mouth would have to be thirty feet in diameter.

FARM.

Times of Milking.

Everybody connected with a cow knows that the first-drawn milk has the smallest, and the last strippings of the udder the greatest portion of cream. But not every one knows the effect of doubling the usual number of times per day of milking a cow. Not long ago we saw a statement that by milking cows half-way between the ordinary morning and evening meals the total yield was largely increased. Here is a report by W. Macro, of Barrow, Suffolk, taken from "Annals of Agriculture" for 1789 :—

May 21st, 1789. Pints.		October 22nd, 1789. Pints.
1st meal	9½	1st meal	11
2nd "	13	2nd "	6
	22½		17
May 22nd.		October 23rd.
1st meal	13	1st meal	11
2nd "	8	2nd "	3
3rd "	5	3rd "	3
	26		17
May 23rd.		October 24th.
1st meal	12	1st meal	10
2nd "	7	2nd "	1½
3rd "	6	3rd "	1½
4th "	1	4th "	3

Of course these experiments settle nothing, for nothing is said of the constituents of the several meals of milk. It would have been interesting to know if the quality of the milk was affected by increased number of milkings. Lambs, foals, &c., which suck often, thrive best.

Preventing Hens Sitting.

A correspondent in Gardening describes a very ingenious and effective method of preventing hens remaining broody. When they show a desire to sit, he says that for the last two years he has been very successful in preventing them from sitting. He has divided his run into two with wire netting, keeping half the fowls in one division, and halt in the other. As soon as a hen in one yard shows any signs of broodiness she is placed in the other, when she invariably spends the first three days in running backwards and forwards, trying to get back through the wire ; at the end of that time she has quite forgotten that she wants to sit, and can be returned, and will probably commence laying again in about three weeks. The plan is obviously far superior to that usually followed of cooping a hen when broody, as the incessant exercise must have a strong effect in removing the tendency to sit.

The new law taxing oleomargarine is said to be steadily increasing the demand for that article in Pittsburg and Alleghany City. A member of a commission-house which handles an immense amount of butterine said : "Butterine has advanced two cents a pound, just the amount of the tax levied on it. This week we shall not be able to fill our orders."

Low prices are, at present, the chief bane of the western farmers. Wheat at 70 cents per bushel, and hogs at $3 per hundredweight, will not pay debts nor make rich very fast. But there seems no immediate prospect of better prices. The competition of the great North-West and of far-off India will compel the cultivation of other products than wheat and pork. Meantime, it is a matter for gratification that there is a prospect of cheap food for the masses.—Rural Canadian.

STATISTICS.

There are now published in the United States 14,160 newspapers and periodicals of all classes. The net increase over last year has been 666. The daily newspapers number 1,216, a gain of 33.

The number of British-born persons who have emigrated to the Australasian Colonies since 1841 is approximately given as follows—Victoria, 510,000 ; New Zealand, 223,000 ; New South Wales, 200,000 ; Queensland, 164,000 ; South Australia, 135,000 ; Tasmania, 28,000 ; West Australia, 15,000.

During 1884 the number of registerrd vessels in Ireland fishing for sale was 5,785, with crews consisting of 20,884 men and 941 boys. Of these 1,518 vessels, 6,014 men, and 407 boys were returned as exclusively fishing for sale ; and 4,197 vessels, 14,870 men, and 534 boys as partially so engaged. The figures show a decrease of 81 vessels and 108 men since 1883, while in the number of boys there is an increase of 59, making the actual decrease of the persons employed 49.

The government clerks employed in the departments at Washington number 15,000; of these 4,000 are women. The latter come as a rule from good families. Many of them are widows of noted generals, the daughters of ex-governors and ex-Congressmen, and now and then we find the relative of a President or Cabinet Minister. Many of them have travelled widely, and the great majority are educated and refined ladies. They do all kinds of work, and receive salaries ranging from $725 to $2250 a year.

The total population of the Fiji islands is only 128,000, of whom 111,000 are native Fijians and 3,570 Europeans. There are besides over 4,000 Indian coolies and 5,500 immigrant Polynesians. These it has been found necessary to import as labourers, for the Fijian himself does not take kindly to the work required by Europeans. In 1875 the revenue and expenditure were £16,433 and £41,522 respectively ; in 1884 they were £91,522 and £98,467 respectively. The total trade in 1880 amounted to £415,000, and in 1884 to £880,000, of which £345,344 stood for exports. The great bulk of the trade is with the Australian colonies, about £170,000 representing the value of the trade with England direct.

The average strength of the regular British Army last year was 198,064—viz., Household Cavalry, 1,377 ; Cavalry of the Line, 16,503 ; Royal Horse Artillery, 4,205 ; Royal Artillery, 28,581 ; Royal Engineers, 6,013 ; Foot Guards, 6,340 ; Infantry of the Line, 126,663 ; Colonial Corps, 2,331 ; Commissariat and Transport Corps, 2,810 ; Ordnance Store Corps, 650 ; Corps of Ordnance Artificers, 41 ; Army Post-Office Corps, 15 ; Medical Staff Corps, 2,470. The number of recruits who joined in 1885 for long service were 1,547, and for short service 38,424 ; while the number who joined from desertion, from the Army Reserve, and from other causes brought the total increase to 47,038. The decrease from deaths, discharges, desertions—5,147—drafts to Army Reserve and auxiliary forces, and other causes, numbered 35,117, making the net increase 11,921. The number of effectives on January 1st last was 192,920

Advice to Lovers.

The young man, when he goes to call on his lady-love, puts on his best duds and makes his mother or sisters fly around and help him get himself up in the best form possible. He jaws them, gets mad, slams things around regardless of consequences, kicks the wall because his shoe pinches, and finally rushes out, looking as cross as a teased terrier.

He forgoes a drink or a cigar for fear of their spoiling his breath, and loads his handkerchief with the perfume best calculated to disguise or smother the taint of cigarette smoke. The young lady is expecting him, of course ; has had her hair up in papers all day ; the afternoon has been spent in getting ready to receive him, and when the parlor lights are burning she looks a very angel. Had he seen her in the morning with a handkerchief tied around her head, heard her complaints of indigestion and nervous headaches, seen her slovenly morning wrappings, and caught a few of her tartly-expressed views on the conduct of her mother and the family in general, he would have been in a quandary as to which region the angel belonged.

In the parlor all is smiles, tenderly-lisped phrases, melting glances, and protestations against all that is rude or disagreeable, and in favor of that which is gentle and long-suffering. They deceive themselves as well as each other. Probably they do not mean it, but they do it. Of course, the ardent youth who reads this will say it is not for him. Those who have had their wings singed in the delusive blaze are the ones who will read it with deepest interest and appreciate it most. They can only sigh and wonder why someone did not say as much to them ; yet there is much satisfaction even in that sigh. If they are sufficiently philosophical to make the best of it, to keep the bright side out, and to persistently refuse to go behind the scenes, they may get along ; but if they give way to regrets, take to drink or finding fault with their mothers-in-law, their days of happiness are done.

Persons of ardent dispositions, especially young persons, should be very careful not to allow themselves to be carried too fast or too far by what they consider true love. It may pan out nothing more enduring than infatuation. The sensations are so similar at first that an expert might be bothered for a while to determine which is which, but time will tell the tale. Love remains bright alike through sunshine and storm, and even time's corroding breath does not dim its lustre. On the other hand, infatuation flashes and burns with an intense, brilliant glare, dimming every other light, and paling the glories that have always been regarded as resplendent. As months pass, however, the glare becomes less and less intense, and finally the place where the fire was is marked only by smouldering embers or unhappy lives.

There are times in the life of every young man when he thinks his whole happiness, usefulness, and existence itself depends on marrying a particular lady. He is in earnest about it, although he may be ashamed of himself a few years later. How fortunate if something happens to prevent his giving way to his matrimonial impulses, because he is just as sure to be ashamed of his silliness married as single. If you can induce married folks to tell you the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth about their young days and their early love affairs, they will all, with rare exceptions, tell of sweethearts whom they regarded as heaven sent, and that no amount of reasoning would have convinced them that they could live without their constant company.

First love is all right if the lovers are properly mated. The mere fondness for each other and the love-sickness which is usually developed in such cases are not a sure sign of fitness for marriage. There are scores of bachelors and maids who are such from disappointment in their first love. It affected them so that they have been unable to banish that "fairest face and divinest form" from their hearts. There is always a vacant chair beside them and an invisible guest at their feasts. These are comparatively rare instances, yet enough to make a respectable exception to the general rule. It is not best to make an engagement until both parties have arrived at an age when they are able to be trusted with the transaction of business. They should have a clear apprehension of the responsibilities they are assuming, have a well-defined course marked out through life, and a definite understanding with each other as to how they are to live. By following such a course there is not much danger of making a mistake.

Unexplored Canada.

No account of the unexplored regions of the world would be complete that left out a considerable part of our own country. Prof. George Low, of the Canadian Geological Survey, has made a trip from Winnipeg to Hudson's Bay, and says that the existing maps of that district are incorrect, being based on descriptions given by Indians.

A great part of the journey from Winnipeg was accomplished in birch canoes paddled by Indians. Until the height of land was reached which divides the direct water-shed of Hudson's Bay from that of Lake Winnipeg, the country was an immense tract of rocks, with scarcely any vegetation. When the Hudson Bay slope was reached, the country became much more fertile.

The party, arriving at the source of Berens River, which flows westward into Lake Winnipeg, soon found the source of the Severn, which flows eastward into Hudson's Bay. The scenery here became beautiful. About one hundred miles down this river from its source Prof. Low's party discovered four or five large lakes, about sixty miles in width. The land within a radius of eighty or one hundred miles of these lakes is fine farming-land, and it was found that the frost would not prevent the raising of crops.

The country from the mouth of the Severn to the Berens River, and to Fort Trout on the Swan River, has never been explored. Prof. Low says that there is a tract eight hundred and thirty miles across from Lake Winnipeg to Hudson's Bay which no white man has ever traversed. In this region there are great numbers of deer and cariboo, but small game is very scarce.

The party stayed at Fort Severn, on Hudson's Bay, a short time, and then travelled along the coast to Yak River, two hundred miles north, and thence returned to Winnipeg.

Railroading Across the Rockies—Natural Obstacles, and How They are Overcome—A Brantford Firm's Contributions to the Work.

The Waterous Company, of Brantford, have received the following interesting letter :—

Ross Saw Mill, Duggan's Siding, B. C.

C. H. Waterous, Jr., Waterous Eng. W. Co., Brantford.

Dear Sir,—As I have now finished here cutting with the mill, I thought that you would be pleased to know how it worked and what amount this mill is able to cut when run with proper care. As it is the first of this particular style of mill, 25 H. P. portable, you have sent to the Rockies, and as I have kept an account of all expenses of running this mill and the amount it cut, I am able to give you a correct statement of what it cost to handle lumber in this part. Any of your customers may rely upon the truth of my statements. As you are aware, I left Brantford on the 26th May, the mill being shipped at the same time. I arrived at the Rockies on the 8th of June by way of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The mill arrived on the 12th and on the 21st we started to saw, and by the 8th of November we had cut 3,500,800 feet. The last month's cutting was the largest, amounting to 817,000 feet. These are the figures of the measurer employed by the C. P. R., and are correct, making an average of 31,423 feet per day of not more than 13 running hours per day. This was all cut into inch boards and 3 and 4 inch planks, and all sized to 8, 10, 12, and 14 wide. All the cutting and edging had to be done with the large saw as we had no edger. The timber was spruce, pine, fir, cedar, and hemlock. I see in some of your circulars that you give the amount of what has been cut per hour and per day, but I thought it would be more satisfactory to you and to your customers to know what such a mill could do in the season, and you may rely upon this statement as being absolutely correct. During this time, the expenses for repairs only amounted to $1.50, viz., for one bolt in friction lever, 1 bolt in saw lever, and repairs on timber gauge. This mill was never stopped one working hour during the whole season. The new perl dogs are a complete success, they are quick and sure to hold every time. I am satisfied that there need be no trouble or delay in running these mills if they are properly looked after. There was no extra chance to make this mill run any better than any other. The men were all picked up as they came along. The only man that had any experience in a mill was the sawyer. I filed the saws myself and kept all other things right. It might be interesting for you to know how much timber it takes to build one of these snow-slide sheds per mile. It takes over 6,461,800 ft. of timber and 62,080 bolts 36 in. long, and 200,000 spikes 10 in. long. I do not refer above to the ordinary snow sheds such as used on the Intercolonial Railway, these are used here also where snow is likely to drift in, but in speaking above I refer to what might more properly be called snow-slides. They are built at a point where snow-slides are apt to occur always in the face of steep and high mountains. One side (the high side of the shed) is built up into the side of the mountain and has a slant over the track something like a shed roof. They are wonderfully strong and you may be sure none too much so as the accumulated snow of many years may start from the top of these lofty hills and come thundering down in masses 50 to 100 or 200 feet thick, with a force that nothing can resist unless it is the mountain on the other side of the valley from which the slide takes place. The snow in passing down slides over the top of the snow slide and passes on down into the valley and on up, may be several hundred feet up, the side of the mountain opposite. One can imagine what would be the result of such a slide striking a passing train. Certainly nothing but pieces of the smashed up wreck, that would be unrecognizable, would ever be found. Near where I am one of these slides happened. The snow came down the mountain in a body estimated to be 175 feet thick. It struck the track and carried it bodily down the mountain to the valley across the river that flowed through the valley, and up the opposite side to about the same height. It was there the railway track was found after the snow melted. Some cars were wrecked at the same time, and were never found, probably the remains were carried down by the melting snow to the Columbia River, and then out to the Pacific Ocean. The location here is a very beautiful one. A photographer who is out among the mountains taking views for the Canadian Pacific, came along one day and took a picture of the mill, and I send you one which will give you a very fair idea of what the place looks like. The mountain that you see to the left is over 5,000 feet high from the railway track. The white spot between the higher and lower peak is snow, and lies in that hollow place all the year around, and that snow is supposed to be 250 feet deep, and is a glacier, it is full of numerous cracks. The men have dropped lines down some of these cracks for over 100 feet without reaching the bottom. The sharp high peak seen on the picture is rough and rugged and difficult to climb. There was a rain cloud floated up against this peak once and burst, letting out a flood of water that brought everything down the mountain with it. Enormous rocks and trees were apparently no obstruction whatever. The course of the water made a clear sweep, and its track is easily seen yet. As it came down the rocks and trees that it bore up would sometimes lodge in narrow places on the sides of the mountain and be piled up 150 or 200 feet high, but the weight of water behind would soon be so great that the dam would give way, and down would come the water again, and rocks, trees, etc., and so kept on until it reached the river, which was raised by this flood until the water stood 20 feet over the track. This cloud-burst did a great deal towards preparing the mill site. Level places large enough to build a mill on are hard to get up here in the mountains. There are some very interesting things up here, and one need not get very lonesome if he has any taste for curious nature. A little way from the mill are soda springs and hot springs, so you can have both, a plain soda and a hot bath, one or both, as you choose, and no thanks to anyone. Soda plain, however. No liquor is allowed up here, which is a good thing, where so many and such different kinds of men are employed away from all law and order.

I have been up the Roumanian, Bulgarian and Thuringian mountains, but the mountains here, I think, are much grander. It is not possible to picture them. However, as you have been on the Andes and Alps, you can think back a few years to the time we were in Santiago, Chili (I now see by the papers you are the Hon. Vice-Consul of that progressive republic), and used together take a walk to the top of Santa Lucia and look off to the snow-capped Andes, it will give you an idea of this place. Only I am here in the very midst of them ; then we were at a distance. Should you or any of the Brantford people be taking a trip over the Canada Pacific to British Columbia they can remember when passing through these sheds that Brantford saw mills with Brantford brains and muscle cut the six million or more feet of lumber that is required to build each mill. For this is not the only one of your mills here ; there are a number of them, and I can tell you it does me good to know that no other mill, American or Canadian (and there are a good many, especially of the former, scattered around the mountains) have done as much or as good work as our own mills. I naturally feel a pride in the old shop and what it does. I have been with you now some 30 years, and there are still at work men who commenced before I did, and I want you to let them know what this mill has done up here, for I know they will be glad to hear from it, and that their work is a success. As I am writing, my mind turns back to a time when we were having one of our annual shop picnics about the time the Canada Pacific was first being talked about. Mr. Robertson, of the Bank of British North America, was making a few remarks and spoke about the great railway, and said it was sure to be built, and would carry from ocean to ocean the Brantford saw-mills. We have seen that now all come to pass, and that his forecast of the future was correct. I have seen the Bratford saw-mills go ahead and cut the timber to build the railway bed, the station, and the fences, and now we have turned back and are cutting the timber and plank to cover the road where it is necessary to protect it from the snow. I have made this letter too long, but there is so much here to be seen and to write about that when you start to write you do not know when to stop. But I know you take an interest in such things as are to be seen here. And I would say come along and see for yourself, and I am sure you will be well satisfied and paid for your trip. With no more at present,

I am, your old fellow-traveller,

JOHN LYLE.

Mr. Lyle enclosed to the company at the same time the following letter from the proprietors of the mill, which speaks for itself :

NOVEMBER 10th, 1886.

WATEROUS ENGINE WORKS CO., Brantford, Ontario.

Dear Sir—We got good satisfaction from the little 25 Horse Power Saw Mill we got from you in the Spring. She has cut 3,508,000 ft. in four months and fourteen days. We call this a little the best work we ever knew for the power. Yours truly, (Signed) McDERMID & ROSS.

Choosing an Occupation.

The choice of an occupation depends partly upon the individual preference and partly upon circumstances. It may be that you are debarred from entering upon that business for which you are best adapted. In that case make the best choice in your power, apply yourself faithfully and earnestly to whatever you undertake, and you cannot well help achieving a success. Patient application sometimes leads to great results. No man should be discouraged because he does not get on rapidly in his calling from the start. In the more intellectual professions especially, it should be remembered that a solid character is not the growth of a day, that the mental faculties are not matured except by long and laborious culture.

Ever remember that it is not your trade or profession that makes you respectable. Manhood and profession, or handicraft, are entirely different things. An occupation is never an end of life. It is an instrument put into our hands by which to gain for the body the means of living until sickness or old age robs it of life, and we pass on to the world for which this is a preparation. The great purpose of living is twofold in character. The one should never change from the time reason takes the helm. It is to live a life of manliness, of purity, and honor,—to live such a life, whether rich or poor, that your neighbors will honor and respect you as a man of sterling principles. The other is to have some business, in the due performance of which you are to put forth all your exertion. It matters not so much what it is, as whether it be honorable ; and it may change to suit the varying change of circumstances. When these two objects—character and a high aim—are fairly before a youth, when then?—He must strive to attain those objects. He must work as well as dream, labor as well as pray. His hand must be as stout as his heart, his arm as strong as his head. Purpose must be followed by action. Then is he living and acting worthily, as becomes a human being with great destinies in store for him.

HOMELY HINTS.

One pair of rubbers costs less than three porous plasters and are a great deal more comfortable.

In bundling up for a cold walk consult the thermometer, not the mirror. An unbecoming horse-blanket is better than a wooden overcoat.

It is waste of thought to envy a richer neighbor. You cannot know her inner life, and her lot is not more enviable than yours unless she is loved more.

Don't be too sure that you know more about the natural traits of your boys than their father does. He knows himself better than you do—or ever will.

Never forget that you and your servant are made of the same clay, though you may have been cast in different molds. You have home, husband and children ; she nothing.

Scan the clothing of persons sent to your house on errands, and wonder if you could battle with the elements in their garb. It may call to mind a forgotten dark closet.

We can not choose our neighbors on this earth, but it is well to cultivate assimilation or at least forbearance. Perhaps we will not be able to choose our neighbors above the earth either.

Men are commonplace enough, as a rule, and it does no good to meet them on their own level. The old Adam or the orang outang, whichever it is, can be shamed out, not driven out.

If it comes to a question of a costume which will be "fit to be seen," or a grand New Year for the children, choose the latter. A happy New Year has its effect through a lifetime, a costume doesn't.

The Highest Success.

The man in English-speaking countries who best deserves the name of the Children's friend is, perhaps, a poor man in London, named George Smith.

He was the son of a bricklayer, and at four years of age was put to work in the yard. With other babies he worked for fourteen hours a day, carrying great lumps of clay, which bent his back and stunted his growth. By working late into the night, they could earn an additional sixpence.

These sixpences George spent for books, by means of which he gained a little serviceable knowledge.

As soon as he arrived at manhood he set himself one purpose in life ; to better the condition of the hordes of overworked children in England. So earnest was his effort that, although he was penniless, friendless, and uneducated, he compelled all England to listen to his terrible story of oppression and want, and by his own effort finally induced Parliament to pass an act by which thirty thousand little children were rescued from the labor which was maiming and killing them, and were sent to school.

He then set to work to help the children employed on canal-boats, whose condition in England was little better than that of the former slaves in the rice-fields. He petitioned Parliament until an act was passed by which sixty thousand children were given an education and time to recover life and health.

This is a noble record. But the best point of George Smith's story is that he is now, a white-haired old man, miserably poor. His whole life and energy have been given to the one task ; he has had no time to make money, and although he has personally known and influenced almost every leading man in England, he has never asked a favor for himself or any selfish interest from one of them.

There are so many histories of men who have achieved fame and fortune held up to Canadian boys for their imitation, that it is surely worth their while to read this record of a man poor and obscure, yet whose success was so noble. Verily, he and such as he shall have their reward in the larger life to which all unselfish service for God and human welfare tends, by divine and eternal laws.

We must believe that in the larger and spiritual kingdom, it is he who denies himself the most for others who will receive the most from God. "He that saveth his life shall lose it" is the law of this world, and "He that loseth his life shall keep it alive" is the law of the larger life.

Visiting the Sick.

The first error is in regard to quantity, the second in regard to quality. We cannot, perhaps, visit the sick too much, if we have time for it ; but we can easily visit them a great deal too much at any one time. Many a sick-room would be helped and gladdened by a glimpse of a friendly face every few days for three minutes at a time. But wait for a month, and consolidate these scattered minutes into three-quarters of an hour, and how different the result ! The new face soon becomes a burden, the new sensation an old one ; the news is told, the excitement is gone by. The patient's face, at first bright and eager, becomes tired and jaded and long ; and still the visitor sits. At last she too—in case it be a woman—notices the change in her friend's look, and she springs to her feet and says, with sincere but tardy contrition, "I am afraid I have tired you." "Oh, no," says the patient; "not at all." It is her last gasp for that morning ; she can scarcely muster strength to say it ; but let us be polite or die. Brevity is the soul of visiting, as of wit, and in both cases the soul is hard to grasp. But there is a difficulty of quality more serious than that of quantity. What is there in the outer world from which it is the hard lot of invalids to be excluded? Sunshine, fresh air, and the healthy life of mankind. These, then, are what the visitor should bring, figuratively at least, into the sick room. Instead of these, how many bring the very opposite—clouds and shadows, and that which is unwholesome and unhealthy. They keep the invalid talking about the very thing she needs to forget—her own symptoms. They discuss the varieties of medicine as topers debate the merit of different wines ; and is dear Amelia quite sure that it would not be best to change her physician? Worst of all, they tell the distressing symptoms of others; the mournful cases, the bereavements, the approaching funerals. Strange to say, professional nurses themselves are very much given to this sort of talk, and would be much more beneficial companions were they dumb. Perhaps the visitor chimes in, and joins with the nurse in a melancholy duet. It is, I take it, almost impossible for any one in health to appreciate the hold that these things take upon an invalid. The visitor goes away into the outer air and the very breeze soon carries away all memory of the untoward conversation ; but the invalid remains anchored to one spot, and broods, and broods, and broods. She is fortunate if her sleep is not broken that night by the odious phantoms for which her dear friend has, with studious care, furnished the materials.

Getting Rid of Fat.

An eye-witness decribes an apparatus recently constructed for the anti-fat cures of Professors Schweninger, Oertel and Ebstein in the following humorous way : "Imagine to yourself a gentleman of aldermanic rotundity, standing in a sort of treadmill, and hard at work trying to mount an imaginary staircase without ever getting above the first step, inasmuch as the upper ones are constantly receding under his weight. This exercise may strengthen his lungs and even make him lose a pound or two of adipose ; but the total effect would be but half accomplished, if the builder of this gymnastic machine had not also, in addition to this simulated mountain ascension, taken care to provide for a corresponding change of air. The physical exertion of ascending the continuously descending steps, causes the unhappy climber to set in motion a system of bellows, which inhail the outer air and blow it full in his face. Instead of the common street air, however, the victim can also be made to inhale air impregnated with extract of pine and other forest trees, and oxygen, thereby procuring him, within the walls of the city, the illusion of filling his lungs with the invigorating air of high mountains. Besides all this, the steps are so constructed as to be placed more perpendicularly, if desired, in imitation of a steep mountain. Bon voyage!"

If there is anything that makes a man long for solitude it is to stand and talk to a man who is breathing the aroma of several brands of poor whisky into his face.

WHAT TRUE MERIT WILL DO.

The unprecedented sale of Boschee's German Syrup within a few years, has astonished the world. It is without doubt the safest and best remedy ever discovered for the speedy and effectual cure of Coughs, Colds and the severest Lung troubles. It acts in an entirely different principle from the usual prescriptions given by Physicians, as it does not dry up the Cough and leave thee diseas still in the system, but on the contrary removes the cause of the trouble, heals the part affected and leaves them in a purely healthy condition. A bottle kept in the house for use when the disease make their appearance, will save doctor's bills and a long spell of serious illness. A trial will convince you of these facts. It is positively sold by all druggists and general in the land. Price, 75 cts., large bottles. E. O. W.

MEN AND WOMEN.

The Empress of Germany intends to pay a visit to Queen Victoria in the spring.

Mrs. Hannah Euston has left the city of Charleston $400,000 for the purpose of "making old age comfortable."

I drank the rosy color out of my wife's cheeks fourteen years ago, and it has never come back again.—Sam Jones.

The German Government prohibits women from entering any Prussian university as students or attending the lectures of the professors.

Christine Nilsson has determincd to make Madrid her future home. She loves the gay and romantically happy life of the light-hearted Spaniards.

Ex-Queen Isabella, of Spain, is still holding court in Paris, where she gives sumptnous entertainments at her magnificent residence, the Hotel de Castille.

Mr. S. H. Puleston, the millionaire member of Parliament, who is about to purchase $2,000,000 worth of Pennsylvania coal lands, was twenty years ago a reporter on a small paper at Pittston, Penn.

The Rev. Henry Ward Beecher noticed that ice is a luxury in England, that waiters are confused by a request for water, and that an American is known in Great Britian by his calling for water and for ice.

The Duke of Sutherland has sailed from Liverpool with a few friends invited to accompany him on his yacht-cruise of some weeks about Florida, where the Duke has large railway and land interests.

Barry Cornwall's widow (Mrs. Proctor) will next year witness her second royal jubilee, as she well remembers that of George III, in 1709. She is considered a most interesting old lady, full of humor and entertaining reminiscences.

The Queen continues a work to which the Prince Consort devoted himself with much assiduity, namely, the collection of engravings, photographs, and other representations of the works of Raphael, etc. The collection is an imposing one, and will comprise about seventy large volumes.

Several months ago the church people of Sydney, New South Wales, sent a letter to Mr. Moody inviting him to come to Australia and hold meetings. They have received a reply that he cannot leave his family now for so long a journey, but he hopes that he may yet visit the colonies.

Whenever Queen Victoria is not sitting for her own portrait, she seems to be giving the artists work to do in her family connection. Groll, the well-known historical painter at Vienna, has been commissioned to paint her a life-size portrait of Prince Alexander of Battenberg, and he goes to Darmstadt for the purpose.

Sir Moses Montefiore, some months before his decease, sent to the Rabbi, of the Nineteenth Street Congregation (one of the leadingsynagogues of New York) a tasteful collection of personal souvenirs of himself; his autographs, olive-wood articles, painted with his coat-of-arms, his photographs, and so on. These are now being sold for the benefit of a deserving Hebrew charity, under the auspices of the Congregation.

Mrs. A. M. Wood is the inventor of "Woodite," a preparation of India rubber to be used as a protection for war ships, and for life-saving purposes. Among the inventions of Mrs. Wood, on view October 6th, at Dartford, England, was a model of a double reversible lifeboat, for which the merit is claimed that it is unsinkable; while if it capsize, as both sides are made alike, the only difference is that the bottom boat is uppermost. There was also displayed a model of a single lifeboat provided with a central tube to serve as a compressed air reservoir for propelling the boat. Further, it is contended that a covering of woodite on boats or piers would prevent much injury from collisions.

Honesty.

There is one topic of interest that is as old as man. As soon as humanity had wants, it had need of honesty. At first it was appreciated only in others. By degrees, men have learned to some extent, that it is a lesson worth learning. They have recognized its value not only from a sense of personal comfort, but as a satisfaction to the better part of man's nature. Dishonesty in the common sense, as constituting theft, is found only among the abandoned or those who willfully expose themselves to the condemnation of society. However, civilization has not yet comprehended honesty in its broadest sense. It should be another expression for duty conscientiously performed. The railway engineer who has for years faithfully preformed his duty, benefits mankind infinitely more than a thousand false preachers. Adam Bede said he was filling part of God's plan in being an honest carpenter. Men in all occupations can in some direct or indirect way improve the world by conscientious faithfulness. By having true carpenters and plumbers, we would have healthier homes, hence healthier people. Having more statesmen and fewer demagogues leading in our national affairs would bring us better government. Examples might be multiplied. Crown Man with the highest order of integrity and honesty and he becomes a monarch, commanding the respect of all nations.

VARIETIES.

A young lady of beautiful features may, it is said, be seen daily in the streets of Berlin driving a luxurious vehicle. She charges however three times the ordinary fare for the immense privilege of being driven by herself.

A remarkable illustration of the penetrating power of science is supplied by the fact that Seoul, the capital of Corea, is now in telegraphic communication with Peking and the rest of the world. Six years ago any European who ventured to visit Corea did so at the risk of his life, all such intercourse with the outer barbaric world being prohibited. Now, as Nature says, "a merchant in London might telegraph direct to the Hermit Kingdom."

There is one tree which has proved itself to be the Cockney of the vegetable world, as it thrives in London, as well as, or even better than, anywhere else. Other trees are suffocated by the particles of solid grime and the coal-tar vapours that are so liberally diffused in our London atmosphere. The plane survives this by the continual peeling of its bark. This peeling is visible to everybody passing; the patches of new green cuticle on the trunk and branches, and the old exuvial bark lying at the foot of the tree, make it thus obvious.

LATE DOMINION NEWS.

Campbellford has a haunted house.

New Brunswick has 1,379 miles of railway.

Owen Sound has had a visitation of dog poisoners.

Mrs. R. McKee, of Mulmur, died recently at the great age of 98 years.

A Deseronto young woman appears on the street with a cigar in her mouth.

New Brunswick is excited over a public exhibition of drunkenness by a prominent and popular clergyman.

A man named Wilkins has been fined $20 and costs by the Mayor of Galt for disturbing the Salvation Army.

An Essex Centre resident realized $35 for the cream from eight of his cows for twenty-six days of November.

Bruce township has a surplus over all liabilities of $3,300, and is one of the most lightly taxed municipalities in the Province.

A young man managed to run up a board bill of $190 at a Victoria, B. C., hotel by describing himself as a son of Senator Wilson, of Montreal.

The young woman of St. John, N, B., who persuaded a detective that she had been assulted while in a fit, is found to be of decidedly questionably repute.

Mr. Thomas Graham, of the 7th concession of Markham, a short time ago lost by death a goose alleged to be 42 years of age, if a Markham paper is to be relied upon.

One woman in Sydney threw stones at another's "lady duck," the other retaliated by throwing stones at the duck's assailant and for so doing, and a variety of other faults, was fined $12.35.

Sheriff Iler, of Essex, has offered the owners of the steamer City of Dresden $100 to deliver the writ and ballot boxes for the coming Provincial election at Isle of Pelee, which is a portion of the south riding of the country.

A row occurred at a dance on the Indian Reserve near Brantford a few days ago, during which a young Indian named Martin received dangerous injuries. Fears are entertained for his recovery, and F. Hill Jacket, Augustus Hill Jacket, Jr., Mrs. S. Hill Jacket, Mrs. A. P. Hill Jacket and J. Garlord have been arrested as participants in the assault. The wounded man is a steady, hard-working Indian, about twenty-three years of age, generally known by the name of Bomberry.

A little boy and girl, children of Mr. Samuel McCourt, Collingwood Township, were recently at home alone in the absence of their parents. To amuse themselves the children got some powder and placed it on the hot stove. The powder exploded and set fire to the little boy's coat, when the lad—with remarkable presence of mind for one so young—pulled it off instantly and threw it into the snow. The faces of both children, however, were so badly burned that they are likely to be disfigured for life.

Mrs. Sisley, of Richmond Hill, on the 14th Dec., reached her one hundredth birthday. The aged lady has two sisters living, Mrs. Armitage, of Stouffville, aged 89, and Mrs. Playter, of Reach, aged 86, and a brother, Mr. John Wilson, of Whitchurch, aged 82. The united ages of this long-lived family makes 357. The family consisted of eleven boys and girls, and the father was a U. E. Loyalist, who went to New Brunswick during the struggle for American Independence, and came to Ontario in 1811.

Recently a charivari was held at the dwelling of Mr. Sippe, con. 7, Brant township, Bruce county, at which a serious accident occurred. Two young men were firing their guns, which they crossed over each other, when one of them exploded and blew the barrel off the other gun. One of the men named Robt. Marshall lost his left hand, which was shattered by the explosion. Nelson Hampson, who was standing by, was injured by the discharge to such an extent that he also lost his left hand. Both hands had to be amputated.

NEW YEAR'S FUN.

A swell affair—The big-head.

Fine language—Ten dollars and cost.

There is very little satisfaction in lightning kissing.

The tender passion—The antipathy against tough steak.

A girl may wear the hat of a man,
And in bobtail coat herself array,
But can never be mistaken for a man,
Because she ain't built that way.

"Well, doctor, is there any improvement in my condition this morning?" "Hardly, my Christian friend; I am afraid you'll have to be thinking of the great change. You do, of course, sometimes consider the certainty of death." "Oh, yes, doctor; that thought strikes me every time you enter the room."

It was at the police court and it was an assault case. The witness testified that the assault occurred on Sunday. "How do you know it was on a Sunday?" asked the lawyer on the other side. "Because that day I had to go to the back door of the saloon to get my whiskey instead of the front door."

Tony McOwen remarked to Captain Norris that he sat down to his breakfast every morning at half-past eight. Norris said it seemed odd that he could sit down to his breakfast at half-past eight, for when he got through it was "ate." Whereupon McOwen drew a revolver and shot Norris dead. The jury said justifiable homicide.

"You are a respectable looking man,' said the judge; "how did you happen to get drunk yesterday and make such a rumpus on the streets that it took four policemen to conduct you to the station?" "I'll tell you, judge," said the prisoner, "My wife insisted that I should accompany her to a piano recital last night. I remonstrated—said it would kill me dead; but she insisted, and so—" "You went out and got drunk to escape the piano recital?" "I did, your Honor; I confess it." "The aggravation was overpowering," said the judge, "and I discharge you. I have been there myself."

Two Brave Brothers.

Particulars have been received at Peterborough of an alarming boat accident and gallant rescue in the River Nene at Whitlesea. Fourteen boys with a gang-master and two young men named George and Edward Dixey were crossing the river in a boat when the craft struck against a post and sank. George Dixey threw one of the boys on the bank, he and his brother also leaping ashore. All the remainder, fourteen in number, were at once helplessly struggling in deep water, four of the boys being 7 years of age and the eldest about 14. Five or six of them clung to the post, with the gang-master, an old man, the others being carried down the stream by the current, which, owing to the swollen state of the river, was very strong. Instantly realizing the position, the two Dixeys, fortunately expert swimmers, dived again and again, ultimately succeeding in bringing eight to land. At this moment the post gave away, and the remainder of the children and the gang-master were at the mercy of the current. Three of the little fellows had clasped each other and disappeared, but rising again were rescued. The others were also got out, and a sad catastrophe averted by the two brothers, one of whom is 16 and the other 19 years of age. Edward Dixey, the younger of the brothers, during last summer jumped into the river and saved a drowning lad, using proper means to restore him as he lay on the river side, and at Liverpool, by diving to the bottom of the canal, he also assisted in saving two men who, clasping each other, had sunk together.—St. James's Gazette.

Catarrh, Catarrhal Deafness and Hay Fever.

Sufferers are not generally aware that these diseases are contagious, or that they are due to the presence of living parasites in the lining membrane of the nose and eustachian tubes. Microscopic research, however, has proved this to be a fact, and the result is that a simple remedy has been formulated whereby catarrh, catarrhal deafness and hay fever are cured in from one to three simple applications made at home. A pamphlet explaining this new treatment is sent free on receipt of stamp by A. H. Dixon & Son, 308 King Street West, Toronto, Canada.

RIFT AND SPRAY,

OR,

LOVE AND VENGEANCE AMONG THE SMUGGLERS.

THE MOST FASCINATING OCEAN ROMANCE SINCE THE DAYS OF COOPER AND MARYATT.

CHAPTER XVIII.

ALMOST A MUTINY AMONG THE SMUGGLERS.

Already are our readers familiar with that little bay and its far-stretching promontories—land-locked almost as it was—bounded southward by the heaving seas of the English Channel—northward, by the tall beetling cliff—one that resembled that celebrity,

——"whose high and bending head
Looks fearfully in the confined deep."

By the side of that cliff is a narrow cutting or gorge, which, with many interruptions from fallen portions of its chalky sides and tangled masses of wild prickly vegetation, leads to the upper land. At about a quarter of a mile distant from the tallest portion of the cliff there had been one of those landslips so common round the coast of England; and, amid the fallen mass which had, in picturesque confusion, made a varied scene of hill and dale, there nestled, looking on to the beach, some half dozen fishermen's cottages.

One of these cottages belonged to Dolan, the master and owner of the Rift. There, ostensibly, he carried on the trade of a fisherman, and there was rather an ostentatious display of black-looking nets hanging over the fence of the neglected garden. A couple of well-formed and perfectly seaworthy boats, though, were drawn up on to the beach in front of the cottage.

It was not often that smoke curled up from the rude chimney of Dolan's supposed home, and it was not often that the door swung freely on its hinges. "Not at home," would have been the general answer of the very old woman, who was usually nearly bent double with decrepitude, crawling about the place.

But there were times when Dolan found it politic and necessary to affect to sit down by his own hearth, and then that woman, whom we have already seen and heard endeavoring to exercise a control over Grace, would be there, and there would be the affected bustle of a little household.

The other cottages—hovels they might be called—were occasionally in the occupation of various members of Dolan's gang of desperadoes. In fact, this pretended little group of fishermen's dwellings was but a blind, to be used occasionally by Dolan and some of his crew, to account for their being in or about that spot at all.

A narrow road led from this cluster of cottages into a high road that went direct to the town.

At the top of this narrow road was a little, low, whitewashed dwelling, in which resided a man with a wooden leg, who pretended to live by making nets, and those lumpy combinations of rope and oakum by which partial collisions between the fishing cutters were staved off and rendered innocuous.

This old man, though, had hanging in his hut a very curious old horn, with many twists and convolutions, such as one sees occasionally in some old French print of sportsmen, in some of the ancient forests of that land of political mutations, and when any strange footstep wandered down toward the beach, past his cottage, he would blow on his old-shaped horn three toots, which, in a strange way, would echo about the cliff and landslip.

And the way was so rough and rugged, the holes and pits so numerous, and the black mud so tenacious, that no one, unless persevering to an uncommon degree, ever went very far in that direction.

But it is not with the cluster of chance fishermen's cottages that we have now to do—nor with the old man at the top of the lone road, with his curious convoluted French horn—nor with the beetling cliff, so far as its outside conformation is concerned; but it is away from the light of day—away from the dancing sunlight, the scudding clouds, and the deep green sea, that we would conduct our readers.

Dimly lighted by a huge old lamp, suspended by a heavy chain, from a hook buried deeply in the chalk ceiling, there is a huge, irregularly shaped cavern. Take it altogether, its superficial area must have been some thousands of feet, although the many irregularities of its shape and the deep indentations that made up its full dimensions, presented the effect of the huge actual size being appreciated.

The walls were green and moss grown in some cases—that first kind of vegetation, which is rather a stain than anything that can actually be defined by the eyes. Flintstones and fossils of many different varieties projected from the chalky rock, and the ceiling, which was an irregular dome overhead, presented many jagged masses, which seemed ready at any moment to fall upon the floor below, or upon the head of any one who might be in the cavern.

Blackened was that ceiling by smoke, and, in some cases, where a fire of logs had been kindled against the wall of the cavern, the flames and the smoke had gone right up to the ceiling, crackling, charring and blackening the chalk in a singular fashion.

There were leading to and from this huge cavern many cuttings or openings—jagged and uneven—some tall and narrow—others of a nearly circular shape, which it would require some stooping and some skill to pass through; and, throughout the whole, there was at times a rushing, moaning sound, as the wind from the bay forced its way through the masses and hollows of the cliff.

This cavern, then, occupied a good portion of the centre of the huge cliff we have spoken of.

By narrow, tortuous passages, which required care to ascend them, other minor caverns could be reached, as well as various lookout places on small plateaux in the face of the cliff, where a human being would have looked, from seaward, like a piece of fluttering weed, or some bird prowling about the face of the cliff.

This, then, was the real home of Dolan, the smugglers, and of his lawless crew. It was reached in two ways—there was a secret passage to it from the gorge in the cliff, there was another passage to it from the bay.

Looking from the sea toward this portion of the cliff-bound coast of England, numerous black, irregular rocks could be seen about the base of the chalky promontories; and these indicated washings away of portions of the cliff, into which the sea, on occasions of unusual storm and commotion in the Channel, had rushed, enlarging by degrees the hollow, until it becomes a veritable cavern of, in some cases, thirty or forty feet in depth.

There is nothing curious or peculiar in these cliff caverns. Row into one at half tide, and you find it gloomy, and with a decided odor of sea weed.

A freak of nature, however, had made one of these openings in the cliff serviceable to Dolan. By some subsidence of the chalk, or by some "fault" in the original construction of the cliff, when upheavings and slips of the coast were probably frequent, almost the whole of that tall cliff was honey combed into numerous caverns, one of which was the large one that we have introduced the reader to, where hung the lamp.

A very rugged kind of flight of steps—broad and steep—for they had been only roughly cut down the steep declivity of a natural passage—led from this huge cavern to the level of the sea in the bay, but still within the cliff; and there was a black looking pool of sea water—a subterranean lake of about three hundred yards across—and which only slightly heaved to and fro on its surface, as it sympathized with the swell of the water in the bay, with which it had communication.

Torches stuck in different parts of the cliff around this sea-lake gave a sort of twilight appearance to the place, and showed a roof about a hundred feet in height from its surface.

On this lake, with an idle motion, stem and stern, rested the Rift.

Dark looking boats were silently rowed over the surface of this inland piece of water, and now and then there was a hoarse cry from some human voice, as an order was given or responded to, the echoes of which would die away in strange gibbering noises through the old cavern.

But it is in regard to how the Rift got into this place that we have now to do, and we will no longer conceal that from the reader.

At one portion of this lake—that towards the south—it seemed to be lost in the gloom of a narrow channel, which, although its ceiling was as high as the rest of the place, or nearly so, was very much contracted at its sides. This narrow channel led directly to one of those crevices or openings in the cliff which we have mentioned and which led out to the open bay.

In effect, then, this lake of dark sea-water, in which lay the Rift so securely, was but an extensive cavern, into which rushed the waters of the bay and in which the level rose or fell, according to the state of the tide without.

The only difference was in the extent of the cavern and in the fact that the opening from the face of the cliff into it was not visible from the bay.

And yet that opening directly faced the south, and, had it been visible, would have presented a jagged aperture of about fifty feet in width and the same in height.

And now for the simple means by which all observation of this opening was baffled.

A couple of old mainsails achieved everything. By a clever system of cordage, managed by half a score of pulleys from within, these two old mainsails could be stretched over the outer face of the cliff, completely hiding the opening from view. They were daubed with chalk. The weather had stained the canvas; sea-water and seaweed had stained it with color resembling the cliff, against the sides of which it flattened itself, and, unless actually suspected and looked for, it might well baffle the closest observer. Many an eye—many a telescope had run over this canvas covering; but what was there to pause at on the face of a cliff? Nothing. And so it escaped just that closeness of searching which might have defined it to be something unusual.

No vessel with more draught of water than to the lightest ever came into the bay at all, and there was no temptation to go close to the cliff, which had a reputation for now and then sliding down a ton or two of chalk into the bay.

At half-tide, then, or beyond it, the Rift could be sailed into the opening, and safely moored in the lake in the cavern; and in five minutes, or less, the canvas covering could be drawn over the aperture in the cliff and gradually, as the tide receded, it could be lowered to meet the level of the sea.

And what, with the shadows from projections, and all the artifices that Dolan and his crew used to give the canvas a natural color, you might have rowed to within a hundred feet of the artifice, and not observe it.

Hence was it, then, that the Rift escaped the Spray; hence was it that the Rift, when apparently close on to the cliff, fired those guns, in order that, sheltered by their smoke (which could not escape except by slowly rolling up the face of the cliff), she might have the opening in the face of the rock cleared for her and sail in, and so disappear, as she had, from before the astonished eyes of those on board the Spray.

With her cargo of smuggled goods the Rift would thus make a good port; and then, at night, boat load after boat load would issue out of the cavern and make for the land-slip, where there would be plenty of assistance to carry them off to a market somewhere inland.

And now we resume the thread of our narrative.

Pale and trembling Dolan stood on the deck of the Rift and the faint light from the torches of the sea cavern fell upon his restless eyes. There was a wildness of expression about the face of Dolan that he had never worn before and had his crew been adepts in physiognomy they might well have expected that the events of this last voyage of the Rift had gone far to unsettle the brain of their bold and unscrupulous commander.

There was a quiver of the muscles about the mouth; an uneasy, restless searching here and there about the eyes; and, now and then, a short, sharp, sudden turn of the head, as though he expected something that it would be terrible to see was close to him and with more than mortal rapidity likely to glide behind his back on his attempt to see it.

Truly, the imagination of Dolan was in anything but a healthful state.

It was the vision in the cabin of the Rift that had been the proximate cause of this mental condition on the part of the smuggler and pirate.

It frequently happens that men like Dolan will, so far as conscience and remorse are concerned, clamber over the wickedness of life; and then does some one circumstance that in itself will seem of less value than many which have preceded it will, like a spark rushing through a train of powder, awaken all dormant fears and dormant consciousness of guilt and shatter all the confidence or indifference of the perpetrator.

It was thus with Dolan.

He thought that he had seen, in his cabin a vision; the vision—delicate, gentle, and beautiful—of that young and innocent girl whom he had left to perish on board the Coquette; the vision of that child-like creature, whose sweet smile and gentle eye had rested upon him for a moment, when he was plundering the lockers of her father's cabin.

Many a strong man had fallen before the vengeful arm of Dolan. He had heard the death-shriek, as drowning wretches, who owed their fate to him, sank amid the waste of waters to rise no more; but nothing had seemed to touch him so much as the heartless abandonment of that young girl in the cabin of the Coquette.

And now he believed that he had seen her, now he fully believed that she had presented herself to him for the purpose of driving him to madness; and, with the superstition which is so frequently the concomitant of such minds as his, he looked upon the appearance as a warning—a warning of death!

Then all the sum of a life of sin—all the iniquities of a life of crime rose up before him; and, as he gazed about him in the sea-cavern, the translation of his expression might have been:

"I am going from life, and then how will it fare with me?"

But it was not likely that such a man as Dolan would wholly succumb to feelings such as these without some struggle.

He roused himself to action, and although there was craven fear at his heart, he strove to speak in his usual tone.

"Now, my men," he shouted, "look alive. The Rift has beaten off the Spray, and in our old home on the cliff we may yet defy all the power that can be brought against us. Bustle now, my men. We have a full cargo, and the night will be just the one for us. No moon, I take it, Martin?"

"None till the twenty-fifth," said Martin, shortly, and, as Dolan thought, with an expression very different from that in which he usually spoke.

Dolan would fain have asked what change had come over him, but he dreaded now to do so, lest the reply should be one that would increase his fear.

Then, from the various deep indentations of the sea cavern, issued boats, and they surrounded the Rift. It was into these boats that the cargo was to be stowed, and then, in some secure hour of the night, they were to be rowed out of the bay, and round the promontory, to the group of cottages in the supposed occupation of fishermen, but the real tenancy of Dolan and his crew.

When there, they would be met by an agent, who would buy all the goods and take all further risks attendant upon them.

This agent, though, knew nothing of the secret caverns in the cliff.

"Look sharp!" said Dolan, with an affectation of firmness, although his voice cracked as he spoke, and several of the crew started, for they could scarcely, at the moment, recognize it, "look sharp, for all must be done to-night, and there is no time to lose."

"Ay, ay, sir," growled one. "I don't think there is, now, as we have fired on a king's ship."

"Who is that?"

"Me—Job Lines. Here I am."

"What no you mean?"

"Just what I said, Captain Dolan, which was that there was no time to lose. Hoy! shipmates—hoy! No time to lose!"

At these words from this man a ringing shout rang through the cavern and the work of unloading the Rift was at once suspended as by a common agreement among the men, which those words were the signal.

"Wha, is this?" shouted Dolan.

"Oh, there will be no harm, captain."

"Mutiny!"

"We don't know the word here. There is no time to lose, mates, is there?"

"None!" shouted the crew.

"What is it? What is it? Are you all mad?"

"No," said one, standing up in one of the boats "but we should be if we went on in this kind of way any longer. It was all very well before a king's ship was in commission against us and before we fired on her. We were smugglers, so far as they knew, and if caught, why the worst that would have befallen us would have been that we should have been clapped on board a man-of-war; but now—now, my mates—now—"

"It's the yard-arm!" cried half a dozen voices.

"Aye, it is."

"What do you mean? What do you want?" said Dolan. "I do not understand you. I share with you all perils—perhaps more than any of you know of. What do you want then of me? What can I do?"

"Share and share alike and let this be the last venture!"

"Ah!"

"Yes, the last; no more of it! Let each go on his own cruise and there's an end."

"I think I understand you."

"Of course you do," laughed one, and then the laugh became general; and Dolan felt that his authority was gone and that his career as captain of the Rift was over.

"I do understand you," he said.

"Silence, fore and aft, for the skipper!" cried one. "He's going to tip us a yarn now, mates."

"Hurrah!"

"Silence all!" shouted Dolan in a voice that awakened every echo in the cavern, for his passion was now roused. "Silence all and hear me, or by the heavens above us I'll finish the cruise by sending to his reward a couple of you!"

From the capstan top, close to where he stood, he lifted a heavy pair of the ship's pistols and held them threateningly. There was a profound stillness among the crew.

"If," he added, "it is your wish that the cruises of the Rift should end, be it so. I keep no ship's company together against their will. I may, or I may not, try to get together another crew. I don't say now one way or the other; but the share of the plunder of our cruises, to which you are all entitled, you shall have freely and honestly; and for your satisfaction, I can tell you that, by the care I have taken, each share will be much more than any of you anticipate."

A loud shout arose from the crew, and one-half of the popularity of Dolan had come back to him.

"I say to you all," he added, "that you will be surprised at what you will get."

Dolan was turning sarcastic.

"And I feel convinced that it will be sufficient to settle you all for life."

"Hurrah!"

"And, now, I have only in the first place to recommend to you all, if you don't want to bring suspicion and the Philistines upon you, to make less noise."

"Ay, ay, captain."

All were hushed.

"And, in the second place, let us get rid of this cargo, which is the cheapest we ever had, since we did not pay Captain Mocquet anything for it, and the money it will produce will add to the general stock largely."

"Ay, ay, sir. That's good—oh, that's all right—fair play all the world over!"

Such were the various expressions elicited by the speech of Dolan, who bent his malignant eyes from one to the other of the crew, while a sneering smile curled the corners of his mouth.

"Then all's well," he said.

"Ay, ay, captain, all's well."

"But when," said one, "will the division of the spoil take place and where?"

"To-morrow night and here!" promptly cried Captain Dolan.

"That will do."

"But, until then, my men, unless you consent to one thing I will leave the cavern at once."

"What is that! What thing?"

"Obey me cheerfully and promptly, as you have been in the habit of doing; for I work for the good of all."

"Yes, yes," cried all present, "that will do."

"Now to work."

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

PEARLS OF TRUTH.

History is the revelation of Providence.

Love one human being with warmth and purity, and thou wilt love the world. The heart, in that celestial sphere of love, is like the sun in its course. From the drop in the rose, to the ocean, all is for him a mirror, which he fills and brightens.

The fact is that a certain class of men love to be quiet, and are ready to sell their country to the evil one himself, that they may live at ease and make no enemies. They have not the manliness to plead for the right, for it must cost them a customer or a friend, and so they plead a superior holiness as an excuse for sulking.

No cowardice is so great as that found in truth. Belief in the rightness of a cause, in the value of a high moral standard, in the supreme righteousness overruling man, self-respect and moral dignity—all go by the board when we condescend to a lie, either spoken or acted, either by suggestions of the false or suppressive of the truth. What ever it may be that we are called on to testify or acknowledge we should stand up openly and without wincing.

The Coming of the New Year.

"I am coming, I am coming!" says the glad new year;
"I am coming 'mid bright smiles, and the sad falling tear."

I am coming to the cottage,
And to the lordly hall;
To loving homes, to lonely hearths—
Coming to one, to all!
No wish can shut me from your door,
No prayers my step delay;
To high and low, to rich and poor,
Comes the glad New Year's Day.

To happy homes and happy hearts
A welcome guest I prove,
Bringing choice gifts and wishes kind
From those we dearly love;
And children from their little beds
Will watch this morning's ray,
And laugh, and shout aloud for joy,
That this is New Year's Day.

To saddened hearts and mourning homes
I come with gentle tread,
And over hearths most desolate
A hallowed radiance shed;
Whisp'ring of hope to hopeless ones,
Joy to the joyless heart
Telling of Him whose life and light
A-heavenly peace impart.

Oh, thank God for the glad new year!
His gift, direct from heaven;
And by our lives let us declare
It is in mercy given;
Whether we greet it with a smile,
Or with the falling tear,
Thank God for all—and from our hearts
Welcome the glad new year.

An Admirer of the Beautiful.

Young Lady—"Are you an admirer of the beautiful, Dr. Slasher?"

Dr Slasher (a young sawbones)—"Oh, yes, indeed."

Young Lady—"What is the most beautiful thing you ever saw?"

Dr. Slasher (contemplatively)—"Well, I think the most beautiful thing I ever saw was the way in which Prof. Deepcutter took a man's leg off at the hospital last week.

Getting Some Satisfaction.

"What's the matter, Bobby?" inquired his mother, as the boy flounced into the nursery.

"Pa s-sent me out of the l-library e-cause I made too much n-n-oise."

"I hope you didn't say anything rude to your papa?"

"N-no," replied Bobby, who knows better than to be rude to the old man, "but I slammed the door."

An Insinuation.

An excited individual rushed into a schoolhouse and asked for the teacher.

"What is the cause of your excitement, my dear sir?" queried the teacher.

"I was just passing the schoolhouse, when I was set upon and insulted by a gang of young blackguards, and I have come to see you about it, as I understand you are the principal."

Really Quite Recent.

"Do you know that short mustaches like mine are all the rage now?" asked a Soho youth of his girl.

"No; are they?" she replied.

"Yes; they are the latest things out."

"I might have known, that too, for if they are like yours they have'nt been out long."

Every piano should have a waterproof covering. If this cover is kept on while the young lady ameteur is above the instrument will last a very lon ime.

A HAPPY NEW YEAR.

"Ring out, wild bells, to the wild sky,
The flying cloud, the frosty light:
The year is dying in the night;
Ring out, wild bells, and let him die.

"Ring out the old, ring in the new,
Ring, happy bells, across the snow;
The year is going, let him go;
Ring out the false, ring in the true."
—In Memoriam.

Thus do we greet the, Janus, two-headed god of the Romans, deity who presides over open doors, standing, as thou dost, on the threshold of the New Year, with a face of regret for the past clouded by the touching sadness of a parting, sent with the sunshine of hope irradiating the countenance of thy other and brighter self.

Ever thus it is, as the scythe of time sweeps the full heads of ripened grain into the storehouse of our lives; thus do we pause and sigh, as we reckon up the results of the year's harvest, over the "might have been," and involuntarily arises to our lips, "God's pardon rest upon the dying year, God's blessing fall like dew upon the young, new months ahead." Tenderly do we whisper, in Tennyson's touching words:

"But tho' his eyes are waxing dim,
And tho' his foes speak ill of him,
He was a friend to me.
Old year, you shall not die.
We did so laugh and cry with you,
I've half a mind to die with you,
Old year, if you must die."

But the chasm between the old year and the new is bridged by the flashing rainbow of expectancy and hope, over which our spirits travel from the past, which is ours forever, into that mystic country of the future.

The observance of the New Year dates far back into historic times. China, the oldest child of civilization, presses to the front with her "flowery kingdom" and almond-eyed people. Egypt follows, under the shadow of her pyramids, with the ibis of Thoth, the genius of the New Year, over the season of which, the rising of Sirius, the dog-star, cast its regulating beams; while the Persian exchanges his nev-ruz or presents of eggs.

The martial Roman, casting aside his sword and armor, arrayed himself in snowy white on the first day of the New Year, and in joyful procession hied to the temple amid clouds of incense and flaming altars, and peace and happiness cast their perfect glory over all the land. Later on, visiting became the order of the day, and grotesque masques wandered at will throughout the streets of the capital, with many quick and fantastic pranks.

Strenæ, for luck, were exchanged, and all the vast possessions, over which watched eagles of Rome, were given over to peace and good-will toward all mankind. The Christian folk, forbidden to join in any of the pagan, observances, spent their time in acts of charity, meditation, and prayer.

About the fifth century, when the 25th of December became acknowledged as the festival of the Nativity, New Year's day was recognized as the commemoration of the circumcision, and solemnly kept as such in the various branches of the Eastern and Western Churches; but it was not until late in the sixteenth century that the first day of January was universally accepted as the opening day of the New Year, Christmas Day, the Annunciation, (25th of March), Easter Day, and March 1st having equally shared with the 1st of January the honor of ushering in the bright New Year.

'Tis the great holiday of France, the jour d'trennes being strictly observed by all classes.

Grotesque customs seem to have been the order of the day in "Ye olden tyme," and still keep their hold upon the present century, the ancient custom of watching the old year out and the new one in still existing, and touchingly appropriate does it seem that old and dear friends, who have stood side by side through good and evil, trials and happiness, should pass into the new order of things hand in hand. In the old town of Coventry, England, on New Year's Day, there sounds through the quaint streets the call of "God-cakes for the New Year," and young and old crowd to eat of the triangular little God-cakes, filled with a sort of mince-meat, and costing about a halfpenny apiece.

In more modern times, among the French, the observance of the New Year's Day is the great holiday of the year, and celebrated much in the same way as the English and Canadians keep Christmas, by interchange of good wishes, presents, and bonbons, reunions of families, and visiting among friends. Indeed, over all the world seems to hover the white wings of the Spirit of Peace and Hope, and the happy face of a whole world is uplifted to an equally happy heaven above.

Labor.

All labor well and worthily performed is in itself a direct means of elevating and improving the laborer. In the first place, it calls forth energy and force, and they grow by exercise. No system of self culture, however elaborate, can ever give that vigor and tone to the system, or that sense of power to the mind, which comes from regular, well-performed labor. To work with a purpose, whether it be at the forge or the shop, in the factory or in the office. in the field or the studio, in the kitchen or the schoolroom, gives a conscious ability that nothing else can produce, and that goes far to make the manly and the womanly character.

The Star.

Christmas Eve—and the mellow light
Of the Star in the East was aglow
O'er the Magi, hastening through the night,
In the desert, long ago.

Christmas Eve, and the gentle light
Of the Star in the East was aglow
O'er the lambs, asleep with their shepherds by night,
On the hillside, long ago.

Christmas Eve—and the golden light
Of the Star in the East was aglow
O'er a Baby's brow, in the holy night,
In a manger, long ago.

Christmas Eve—and the blessed light
Of the Star in the East is aglow,
As it shone of old, through the sweet, still night,
O'er Bethlehem, long ago.

CATARRH OF MANY YEARS STANDING CURED.
Dr. N. Washington, Throat and Lung Surgeon, Toronto and Halifax:
DEAR SIR,—I am pleased to express my extreme satisfaction at the results of your "NEW METHOD" of Inhalation which has cured me of Catarrh of a very troublesome character; in fact all the usual remedies failed to give me any relief, but your Treatment, from the first, gave great ease, and in a few months entirely cured me of a most annoying disease. I can honestly recommend any who may be suffering as I was to your skilful consideration.
Yours truly,
GEO. GOULDING,
Rept. C. Turnbull, Galt, Ont.,
also W. H. Storey & Son, Acton.
Dr. Washington will make monthly visits.

Flesherton.

Christmas day passed over pleasantly and quietly in our village; Christmas morning was ushered in by Choral Singers in our streets; In the evening the annual S. S. anniversary of the Presbyterian Church was held, the tables were laden with good things for all and very prompt on time the programme was entered upon, which was well sustained by the children of the school and was very interesting throughout. The Christmas Cantata, "Santa Claus visit to the school" was very creditably gone through by the scheol under the able leadership of our popular Jeweler Mr. J. G. Russel; from the applause given the renderings appeared to be duly appreciated. The church was filled to the doors, proceeds over $70.00,

Monday Nomination day there was a good turn out of ratepayers to hear the record of the officers in power for the past year and to re-nominate, and nominate new men for the coming year.

Good feling prevailed throughout most of the discussions: we have never had the pleasure of attending as good township meetings heretofore; Questions of interest were discussed and well ventilated in an intelligent and interesting manner.

No very serious charges were sustained against any of the members of the council.

Dr. Christoe is again nominated for Reeve to be opposed by Mr. A. Elliott; the Dr. has little to fear from that quarter.

Mr. Thorp Wright an intelligent and enterprising farmer in ward No 3 received nomination for Reeve but after delivering an animated speech principally dealing with the career of the present Reeve, he withdrew his name from the contest. Mr. Brown of Priceville (Ward no 1) has been such a good little boy not a word was said against him having no opposition he comes back to the board without spot or wrinkle.

Mr. J. Boland for ward no 2 had no very serious charges to answer to but will have long and he thought strong opposition in the person of Mr. W. McLoughry. (In ward no 3) Mr. W. G. Pickell gave the most intelligent account of his doings the past year as councillor, of course he did not please every body consequently his opponent will be in the person of Mr W. Sharp an enterprising young man from the centre of the ward who made his maiden speech; he promised to be a good boy if elected. Ward no 4 Mr. McKee thought he performed the duty of his office faithfully during the past year but it appears not to the satisfaction of all, his opponent will also be another enterprising young man in the person of Mr, Henry Cairns; his was also a maiden speech its special charecteristic was its brevity; we thought if the same happy bashfulness accompanied Mr. C. in all his relations in life it is not to be wondered at that he is not wedded. If elected we have no doubt Mr. Cairns will make a good councillor.

Mr. S. Pedlar received nomination for ward 4 but after a happy speech withdrew his name Mr, Jacob Sloan of Eugenia performed the duties of chairman in a very satisfactory manner.

Sudden Death.—Mr. J, S. Plews of Shelburne, brother of Mr. Angus Plewes of this village, died suddenly on Thursday the 23 ult, He dropped dead while driving in his sleigh in Shelburne. Deceased was a man of 40 summers, strong, hearty, and an enterprising business man, proprietor of Shelburne roller flour mills, was highly respected. He was a prominent member of the A. O. U. W. about one hundred of whom attended his funeral: leaves a wife and seven children.

The Presbyterian annual tea-meeting was held in Haskett's Hall on the evening of New Years-Day and notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather there was a fair turn out. A plentiful supply tea and eatables were served and apparently relished, after which the program was entered upon. The choir gave several selections which were well rendered; recitations and music also by local talent and a short address by Rev. Geo. H, Cornish and Dr. Sproule, M. P. after which the entertainment concluded at an early hour.

The Brass Band made their annual serenade on the last night of the old year. It was pleasant indeed to remain comfortable in bed and listen to the excellent music as the band went from house to house, but not so pleasent to turn out at 2 o'clock in the morning to entertain our worthy young men and replenish their finances. We are glad to know however that the results are satisfactory, and that, as the place has grown so rapidly they were unable to "do" the whole town but will complete the serenade on "Old New-year's-eve.

Christ Church Christmas Tree entertainment was held in Haskett's Hall on the evening of Thursday last, and was in every respect a grand success. The hall was crowded to the door. The Operetta "Laila" was well rendered, in fact this was something extraordinary for a rural School to attempt and tho' it must have taken a great deal of time and practice it was exceedingly well given; The scenery and costumes were also appropriate and handsome. Two Xmas trees were heavily laden with presents for the children and others and were distributed by Santa Claus Himself, to the delight of the children. Miss Ford deserves especial credit in connection with the Operetta which was under her supervision.

Miraculous Escape.—On the night of the Ontario Elections while D. Arnott was returning home from Markdale on horseback, he fell asleep and the horse (a three-year-old colt) wandered into Thos. Campbell's lane half a mile from town and dropped into a well some 50 rods from the road. There were loose boards over the well, which is 27 feet deep and some three feet of water in it. No body appears to understand how Arnott escaped going down with the horse, and it is said he hunted about the field for the horse not knowing what happened him; when he found him he hastened for help and secured the service of Jo. Irwin, a well digger, with windlass &c., and they soon wound up the animal but when about to land him he slipped through the tackling and fell again to the bottom. The second time however the horse was safely landed and strange to say not much the worse, and is now all right again.

FREE TRADE.

The reduction of internal revenue and the taking off of revenue stamps from Proprietary Medicine, no doubt has largely benefitted the consumers, as well as relieving the burden of home manufactures. Especially is this the case with Green's August Flower and Boschee's German Syrup as the reduction of twenty six cents per dozen, has been added to increase the size of the bottle containing these remedies, thereby giving one-fifth more medicine in the 75 cent size, The August Flower for Dyspepsia and Liver Complaint and the German Syrup for Cough and Lung troubles, have perhaps, the largest sale of any medicine in the world. The advantage of increased size of the bottle will be greatly appreciated by the sick and afflicted, in every town and of village civilized countries. Sample bottles for 10 cents remain the same size. E. O. W.

RUTH ELLIOTT;

OR,

A PROPHECY FULFILLED.

A TALE OF SOCIAL LIFE IN CANADA.

BY W. E. BESSEY, M. D.

PART III.—The Wedding.

"Oh, fortune, turn thy wheel around,
As I now turn my spinning wheel,
Let life glide on without a sound,
Smoothly as silk upon this reel;
Turn, fortune, turn thy wheel of fate,
Tell me, is good or ill in store,
For me will there be frowns of hate?
Or will love live forever more?
Or will love live forever more?"

"This was the burthen of the song,
The song sung by a maiden fair,
Slowly the wheel, she tarries long,
As lifts her heart in ardent prayer.
While slower goes the wheel around,
She eager lends a listening ear,
Like earnest echo comes the sound,
Oh! maiden, list, but not with fear!
Oh! maiden, list, but not with fear!"

"Weaver thou art of thine own life,
Mistress thou art of thine own fate,
Daily thou spinnest peace or strife,
Thine own toil maketh love or hate;
The web of life is good or ill,
Thine own work proves what is in store.
Thy fate, which spun by thine own will,
Brings life or death for evermore,
Brings life or death for evermore!"

The wedding day was some time in being decided upon. Many interests had to be considered, and the convenience of a large circle of friends consulted. Finally Christmas night was selected as most convenient for all.

The wedding morning broke propitiously, but the sky became overcast before noon, and a heavy storm of snow and sleet set in. As the day wore on it looked as if the old year was determined upon arraying himself with a profusion of winter's fleecy garb.

The trees, shrubbery, hedgerows and evergreens assumed the most fantastic forms and made of the beautiful surroundings of the Elliott mansion a charming fairy scene.

The day was well chosen, for amid the general call to happiness, the bustle of spirits, and stir of the affections, which prevail at this period, what bosom could remain insensible? It is indeed the season for regenerated feeling—the season for kindling, not merely the fire of hospitality in the hall, but the genial flame of charity in the heart; the scene of early love rises again green to memory beyond the sterile waste of years; and the idea of home, fraught with the fragrance of home joys, reanimates the drooping spirit as the Arabian breeze will sometimes waft the freshness of the distant fields to the weary pilgrim of the desert. As the season brings with it fresh delights so does the ceremony of marriage, for

"What a delicious breath marriage sends forth—
The violets hold not sweeter. Honest wedlock
Is like a banqueting house, built in a garden,
On which the spring flowers take delight
To cast their modest odours."

By seven o'clock p.m., the time appointed for the ceremony, the church of St. James the Apostle was well filled with an expectant company. As the bride appeared leaning on her father's arm and took her place before the altar rail, hymn 350, Ancient and Modern, beginning

"The voice that breathed o'er Eden,
That earliest wedding day,
The primal marriage blessing,
It hath not passed away,
Still in the pure espousal
Of Christian man and maid
The Holy Three are with us,
The threefold grace is said," was sung by the choir boys.

She was accompanied by three bridesmaids, favorite old schoolmates at the convent of Villa Marie—M'lle Louise Granger, Miss Maude Harrington, and Miss Rose Rankin. The bride was arrayed in white satin and tulle, with wreaths off white flowers and a bunch of white roses on her bosom. Her bridal veil was fastened by a spray of diamonds and sapphires; she also wore a crescent of diamonds and sapphires and a diamond bracelet—the latter gifts of her mother—the crescent having been handed down from her grandmother. The bridesmaids wore dresses of cream, pink and heliotrope satin, with bunches of chrysanthemum artistically fastened by a miniature butterfly, with wings extended, whose variegated colors were secured by a beautiful arrangement of precious stones; while their eyes were diamonds. These were souvenirs presented by the bridegroom and were expressly ordered for the occasion.

A prettier or more charming bride had seldom been seen at the altar in Montreal—that city of beautiful women—while the whole wedding group formed a picture long to be remembered by those present. The bridegroom was attended by three of his intimate friends, in evening dress. The hymn ended, the ceremony was performed by the rector, Canon Ellwood, and his assistant.

At its close, as the bridal party returned, the wedding march of Mendelssohn pealed forth from the organ—all seemed full of gayety but the bride, who looked serious and scarcely smiled. The wedding party returned to the Elliott mansion and partook of a most luxurious banquet, after which the conveyances were ordered to convey the party to the station, as they intended to depart by the ten p.m. train to Boston. Showers of rice and old slippers followed their departure. The bride's travelling dress was a tailor-made gown of drab Melton and corduroy velvet trimmings with a drab felt hat trimmed to match.

As she stepped into the drawing-room car and took her seat beside her newly made husband, she looked queenly in her beauty, but a sad expression rested on her countenance almost amounting to gravity.

This arose from the consciousness that she had not her father's hearty approval of, but merely his passive assent to, the course she was pursuing.

There was not much hilarity among the group of assembled friends at the station; all seemed to feel that for her it was a serious adventure, and the guests left early that night from the old Elliott mansion on the hill.

The young couple returned in time to allow Ruth to join her mother in receiving on New Year's Day, and the house was en fete the entire day, while many were the callers and hearty the congratulations. A formal reception was arranged for the evening, at which the company, mostly young people, was unusually large, convivial and happy.

Young Blackstone rejoiced in the possession of the loveliest of all the merchant princes' daughters of the West End, and his friends warmly congratulated him on his good fortune.

He had avoided all indulgence faithfully, and Mr. and Mrs. Elliott began to feel a hope that after all Ruth might be the making of him; but he was only keeping a promise made to Ruth, for she had refused to become his wife until he pledged that he would never drink while he was her husband.

So impressed had she been by her father's fears that she had reopened the subject and begged him to renew his pledge and to satisfy her that her father's fears on that score were at least uncalled for, and he renewed his vow as only lovers can do who have not yet secured a much coveted matrimonial prize.

On the return of the young couple, Mrs. Blackstone was the recipient of many calls and good wishes from her lady friends, but the quiet sadness of her mein impressed every body; she already seemed a disappointed woman. It looked as if she had already discovered some secret she had not known or believed before, which weighed heavily upon her spirits and seemed to produce an absent-mindedness quite foreign to her usual manner.

At the "Epicurean Club" young Blackstone was handsomely entertained by his bachelor friends and admirers with a champagne supper in honor of his recent marriage.

In proposing the various toasts of the evening speeches were made by several young gentleman, among them Mr. Dolittle, Mr. Shallowpate, and Mr. Spendthrift, also young Lord Peacock, a recent English arrival of the Oscar Wilde school—who, continually, referred to the remarkable coincidence which existed between his own circumstances and those of the guest of the evening. Remarkable, indeed, he thought, and they would all see it when he told them that, like his friend, his wealth consisted in rare personal accomplishment only; like his friend he was engaged—although not yet married he hoped some day to be—to the richest and most beautiful of all the wealthy heiresses of old Hengland—a daughter of the nobility—(applause, and exclamations of "happy fellow")

All the speakers indulged in the most adulatory expressions of congratulation toward young Blackstone, and all joined in calling him a "deuced lucky fellow."

The hero of the occasion in replying said that "he must confess that he loved luxury, he considered himself a favorite of Fortune and born to luck as the 'sparks to fly upward,' and having secured a prize in the matrimonial lottery he felt that, by one lucky stroke of diplomacy on which he plumed himself exceedingly, he had assured to himself a future of not merely ordinary comfort, but, if he were so minded, of the most profuse luxury, and he believed life was given one to enjoy, therefore, he intended having all the pleasure it could afford." ("Bravo! Bravissimo!" shouted his companions.) "I like good things," he said, "I am inclined to be epicurean in my taste, fastidious in my habits, luxurious in my inclinations and my indulgences, and I love to feast my eyes on beauty. (Bravo! bravo!! bravo!!!) I cannot better express my views than by telling you, in the language of a Prince and bon-vivant, that if this citizen knows himself—and he thinks he does—:

"I will have all my beds blown up, not stuff'd;
Down is too hard; and then, my oval room,
Fill'd with such pictures as Tiberius took
From Elephantis, and dull Arctine
But coldly imitated.

My meat shall all come in in Indian shells,
Dishes of agate set in gold, and studded
With em'ralds, saphires, hyacinths and rubies;
With tongues of carps, dormice, and camels' heels
Boiled i' the spirit of Sol and dissolved pearl;
Apician diet 'gainst the epilepsy;

Gold-fish as sardines in oil-of-olives dress'd,
Butterflies of gay and spangled wings
Preserved in virgin honey—that liquid screne
Born of the air—distill'd fragrance—
By some sweet mystery of dew
In bosoms of rarest flowers.——

And I will eat these broths, with spoons of amber
Headed with diamond and carbuncle;——
My wife shall feast on birds of Paradise,
Humming birds stuff'd and fruits of tropic climes.

My foot-boy shall eat golden-pheasants,
Stuff'd wrens, and calvered salmons,
Trout, smelts, lampreys; I myself will have
The beards of barbels served instead of salads;
Oil'd mushrooms, and fishes' eyes.—

My shirts
I'll have of taffeta sarsnet, soft and light
As cob-webs: and for all my other raiment,
It shall be such as might provoke the Persian,
Were he to teach the world riot anew;
My gloves of fish and bird skins, most delicately prepared,
And perfumed with the odors of Paradise
And spice laden eastern air.

And if my resources fail me.—why
I must then, the short coming of my means,
Piece out by stepping forward as the Spartan
Was told to add a step to his short sword."

This was greeted with the wildest applause.

And yet, as Michael Angelo said:

"The men that women marry,
And why they marry them, will always be
A marvel and a mystery to the world."

A "welcome home" evening with a banquet was given at the Blackstone family residence the following week, and an unusually large company assembled to join in the festivities and rejoice with young Blackstone over his good fortune. The early part of the evening was spent in amusement and at ten o'clock the doors of the large dining-hall were thrown open and the guests filed in.

There was no stint of display, and if Blackstone, Sr., had been numbered among the city's millionaires no more luxurious scene could have been imagined. Mr. Elliott, who, as a specially honoured guest, began to think that after all the Blackstones might be much finer people than he had ever been led to suppose.

The company was very hilarious and many were the rallys, the witticisms and the jokes—good old English ones—that aroused the spirits of the convivial guests.

When the ladies had retired and the cloth had been removed and many of the younger men, who preferred dancing, had retired to the parlors, there was no lack of toasts and toasters, and as there was plenty of wine and liquors to suit every taste, the old butler was kept quite busy opening corks, (specially champagne, however.) And so they toasted the bride in a flowing bowl; and they drank to her queenly face; and they sang her peans lusty and strong; while they toasted her every grace. And they toasted the groom, and hoped full soon he'd be the leading barrister of the day, as successful in winning his cases in law affairs as he had proved himself in affairs of the heart. But this did not satisfy old Gerald Pim, brother of Admiral Pim, of Arctic notoriety, so the old sailor gave a toast for the first, born as in follows, true sailor fashion saying

"Here's to the cock that crows in the morn;
Here's to the chick that is yet unborn;
Here's to the girl with the golden hair;
May the twain be always a prosperous pair."

Poor Blackstone on rising to respond was noticed to be under the influence of too much champagne. In attempting to reply he essayed to be witty; then he tried a bit of eloquence; again he attempted to be brilliant, but it was all a failure. Still he talked and would talk, exhibiting his maudlin state in painful persistence. In vain his friends pulled at his coat tail; in vain they applauded to the echo; this only made him go on. Mr. Elliott was confused, amazed, disgusted.

Abruptly he proposed the National Anthem, which they sung, when the party left the table and joined the ladies in the drawing-rooms.

Blackstone was hilarious, talkative, silly in his remarks; in fact, drunk. He insisted upon a chum going back to the dining-room with him for just another glass of champagne.

"Old boy, you know, this is my wedding feast; you know, old fellow; let's have a cigar and another glass before you go."

They found the obliging old butler outside who furnished them with a bottle of wine and glasses. Over this they sat until it was late; the guests had all gone.

Blackstone did not retire with his wife that night, but was assisted to a room by the faithful old butler. He was hopelessly drunk.

On being put to bed he said to John, "Very sick, eh?"

"No, taken too much," was the butler's reply.

"Well, drunk then, I s'pose, eh?"

John stowed him away and left him.

The next morning there was a silent company at the breakfast table. Blackstone turned up in his wife's room as she was dressing. She scarcely spoke to him—her heart was too full for speaking. She had cried herself to sleep the night before, she realized the awful abyss into which she was to be dragged by the man she had chosen to be her husband.

Well, she had no one to blame but herself, she reasoned, and now all she could do was to nerve herself for the struggle, and if she had any influence with him—and some one had said that "Woman's influence was almost omnipotent"—she would make a new man of Arthur Blackstone.

Poor girl! She did not realise that King Alcohol is more omnipotent than Woman.

He attempted to kiss her, but she drew away, and left the room in silence.

From that day forward he drank freely and openly, and made no effort to conceal his habits. He might be seen to enter the Bodega several times each day. His face began to wear a deeper hue, he carried his sign about with him, his habits were imprinted in his face, apparent to everybody. His clients began to lose confidence in him, and their number did not increase, but the opposite.

Meantime his young wife set herself heroically to her task of reforming him. But no—on, on he goes, no pause in his course until everything is lost. Honor, business, reputation gone. And but for his wife's income and the social standing of the Elliott family he would ere this have been a social outcast.

A year has passed, and a new arrival has come in the form of a sweet girl baby to bless their home. The young wife still clings to hope and thinks perhaps this will bring a change in his habits. And so it does, for a time, but soon he was back to his old haunts and habits.

He was known to be a clever, well-informed lawyer. He soon became the tool of designing, unprincipled schemers, who, finding him devoid of principle, were as ready to use him as he was ready to be used for the furtherance of their fraudulent designs.

In this way he managed to appear to have some important business on hand and to buoy himself up with great expectations which were never realised.

Finding it impossible to obtain sufficient funds by fair means he took to imitating his wife's signature to orders on business houses, and finally growing bold with success, he ventured on making and signing cheques purporting to be her signature. At first astonishment only affected Mrs. Blackstone, as she found several unexpected bills presented for payment. Soon her suspense grew to apprehension as she began to realise that some one was tapping her income before it could reach her, and finally finding one of these unfortunate cheques in a pocket one night, when he returned home unusually drunk, revealed to her the true culprit.

Here was a new trouble. Life was growing a burden, her heart was weary; what should she do? Would she consult her father and tell him all? She shuddered, and shrank from the trial. But it must be done. Bills must be met. Creditors were importunate, her own and his, what would she do? She could not meet them. She could not put them off any longer. Her own balance was used up.

Mr. Elliott grew very angry, on questioning her, as to the reason of her funds having been all exhausted. She essayed one excuse after another. What could she say; bursting into tears she admitted it all.

"I will submit the matter to my solicitors," he said. "Meantime the money necessary will be advanced you against future allowances," he said, as he drew up a letter of credit to her bankers.

Next day Mr. Elliott submitted the whole matter to his solicitors, who recommended that Mrs. Blackstone's banker be taken into their confidence; that old cheques be revised and the good and bad separated; and that any further peculations be attended by an immediate criminal action on the part of her bankers against the said Arthur Blackstone for forgery.

The opportunity was not long in coming. A cheque in his wife's name was presented next day; it was retained for the money to be sent. Meanwhile Mr. Elliott was notified, and he at once sent over to his daughter to know whether she gave a cheque that day in favor of Nettleton & Co., wine merchants, for $100. A reply in the negative being received the matter was at once put into the hands of Mr. Elliott's solicitors, and they, before taking proceedings, ascertained that Nettleton & Co.'s bill against Mr. Blackstone was ten dollars, which he had promised to settle that day. Evidently he had enlarged the amount to $100, while drawing on his wife's account at the bank to meet his little liquor bill.

Next day he was arrested. His wife, distracted, rushed to her father's office imploring him to secure his liberation. As might be expected he was inexorable, the law must take its course, and the scoundrel put beyond the power of beggaring her and her child. It was a sad reflection upon the self-willedness of a woman in love, but she was still his child, and it was a duty he owed to her, and her child, as well as to society, to see that no clemency should be exercised toward such a brute.

Feeling the justness of her father's conclusion, the fitness of his quiet rebuke for her waywardness, and how futile any attempt on her part would be to change his mind, she silently withdrew.

Looking up from his writing and finding her gone, he exclaimed: "Poor Ruth, I would have spared you all this, but you would not need my advice; and I was forced into an acquiescence to your ill-starred marriage, by an attempted elopement in my desire to avoid a scandal. I did my duty then,—I'll do it now!"

Poor Ruth walked hurriedly homeward along the busy streets, burdened with grief, resolving in her mind, that as she had one friend to whom she could always go with her griefs, sure of finding sympathy and consolation, to that friend—her mother—she would go with this new grief, and perhaps she would be able to influence her papa and prevent the matter from becoming public.

As she entered her old home—the Elliott mansion—she met her mother in the hall, and throwing herself upon her neck, burst into a flood of tears—imploring her, 'mid sobs and tears—to prevail upon her father not to allow the law to take its course against Arthur—and thus complete his disgrace. "Let the money go," she said, "it was my money he was taking, and if I forgive him, why can't papa?"

Her mother spoke kindly to her, assuaged her grief, comforted, sympathized with, and caressed her, and when she was calmed and in a reasoning mood, she began to reason with her after this manner:

"My dear," he said, "leave it to papa; you may be sure that your interests will not suffer in his hands, and that he will do whatever in his judgment is right. Meantime, what are the lessons you should learn from this experience that may be profitable to you in the future? First, can't you see that as the quality of the seed that is sown is proved by the fruit it produces; so, the quality of our acts is shown by the consequences which follow. You forced your father to acquiesce in a marriage his better judgment could not approve of by your attempted elopement to prevent a scandal, you got your own way then; now you are getting your wages? Disobedience always brings its own punishment; that was an act of filial disobedience; the punishment has not been long in coming, but may be long in leaving; for it may entail upon you a lifetime of suffering. God grant you a speedy deliverance, my poor, troubled child. Any way, you can come back to the old nest, Birdie? and be warmed and fed and clothed and comforted. Are you going now?" she said, as Ruth rose in silence to depart. "Well then, keep up heart, and come back, Birdie, to the old nest whenever you feel like it," so kissing her, she was gone.

"As gold is tried by fire, so must the heart be purified by suffering," I suppose, soliloquised Ruth, as she left the old home for the new, "but my sufferings, it is quite true, are the result of my own filial disobedience. I have had my own way, and I am having my own wages, that is all true. I can only pray that He who tempers the wind to the shorn lamb, will temper this affliction to me and give me grace to bear it patiently and without murmuring until he says 'it is enough.'"

THE OLD YEAR AND THE NEW.

BY JOHN IMRIE, TORONTO.

Listen! to the midnight bell,
Tolling out the old year's knell;
O'er our hearts there comes a spell
Such as when we say—"Farewell!"
As we ponder o'er the past
Eyes are dim and overcast,
Silent falls full many a tear
As we part with thee—Old Year!

Seasons come and seasons go,
Summer flowers and Winter's snow,
Like the ocean's ebb and flow,—
Joy and pain, and weal and woe!
Birthday greetings—glad and gay—
Wedded hearts were linked for aye;
Not a churchyard but a mound
Tells what reaper Death hath found.

Yet we welcome thee, New Year,
And approach thee without fear;
Though we know not what may be
Portion'd out for us in thee.
Let us hope, and watch, and pray,
Growing wiser day by day;
Learning lessons from the past—
As this year may be our last!

Though the Old Year now must go,
Shrouded in a sheet of snow,
May the snow an emblem be
Of the New Year's purity!
As our footsteps in the snow
Show the path we wish to go,
May each day our record be—
Coming nearer, God, to Thee!

There are no more vicious habits than adopting measures to "keep awake" or employing artifices—or, still worse, resorting to drugs and other devices—to induce or prolong sleep. Dozing is the very demoralization of the sleep function, and from this pernicious habit arises much of the so-called sleeplessness—more accurately wakefulness—from which multitudes suffer.

CHRISTMAS MEETING OF THE LIME KILN CLUB.

In accordance with the resolutions adopted at the last regular meeting, Paradise Hall was thrown open last night to the members of the club, and upwards of 200 assembled to help honor the occasion. Some five years since the club adopted the idea of consolidating Thanksgiving, Christmas and New Year's into one general holiday, to be known as "Thankschrisyears," and have ever since maintained it. This saves time, trouble and expense.

Each member can have his turkey, hang up his stocking, and begin the New Year all in twenty-four hours.

A PLAIN CASE.

"My frens," said Brother Gardner, when the triangle had called the meeting to order, "der am a great difference of opinion as to de origin of thanksgivin.' Some say it was to return thanks to de Lawd fur His goodness; odders say it was an appinted time fur kickin' up de hecls arter de craps war' all in an' de cor's husked; odders still, dat it was to get shet of de surplus chickens an' turkeys in de kentry. Some folks keep de day by gwine on a spree; odders by gwine to church. I find dat no two races an' skeercely any two religuns agree as to de origin of Christmas. Our New Y'ar comes on de first of Jinuary; de Chinese hev one to please deirselves; de Roosians am six or eight weeks off; de Arabs cotch it when dey kin. It am a mixed up affair all around, an' to settle all disputes we has adopted Thankschrisyears as our holiday. We am sertin dat dis holiday comes once a y'ar; it comes when cider am at its best, an' 'possums an' persimmons am de fattest; its origin am not buried in de depths of obscurity, but stands out as cl'ar as a red nose on a statesman's face. I take great pleasure in informin' you dat de day has bin accepted an' adopted by de cull'd race in general, in di United States an Canada, an' dat all signs pint to its airly adopshun by de white race."

SIR ISAAC WALPOLE.

Sir Isaac Walpole was then invited to address the meeting, and after some hesitation he got his stiff leg under him in shape to help hold him up, and said:

"My frens, to-morrer we begin a New Y'ar, gittin' at least a week de start of white folks. I trust that ebery pusson in dis hall to-night will go home wid a determinashun to make some change in his life for de better. If dar am any theives among you, let all such resolve to stop stealin'. If dar am any burglars, resolve to stop burglin'. De liars should cease lyin' an' de dead-beats should resolve to borry no mor' money nor beg any mor' terbacker; make dat resolushun not fur a day, or a week, or a month, but fur a y'ar, an' sot your foot down dat you won't break it under any sarcumstances.

"We can't expeck to be perfeck by a long ways, but let us resolve to be as perfeck as we kin. Our aim should be to improve ourselves each y'ar, instead of standin' still or rollin' down hill. So far as I kin personally incourage any one of you I shall cheerfully do so, onless it happens to be a pusson who walked off wid my bone-handled umbrella at de las' meetin'. Dat individual am, in my belief, beyond de influence of good, an' in case I diskiber his cognomen, an' kin succeed in meetin' him in an ally, dar' will be a rumpus to shake de hull Stait of Michigan."

ELDER TOOTS.

This veteran was called upon for a few remarks, and after drinking a slipper of water and wiping off his mouth on his coattails, he responded:

"I ar' reminded to-night of de solemn fact dat me an' de old woman am one y'ar older. We has reached another milepost on de way to dat unknown land from which nobody ever comes back to write up a discripshun fur de noosepapers. I has fully resolved to turn ober a new leaf fur de comin' y'ar. I'ze gwine to stop readin' dime novels, swearin' at my mule, an' jawin' de ole woman."

TRUSTEE PULLBACK

Exhibited considerable agitation as he rose up, and it was a long minute before he could control his voice to say:

"I has been a bad, bad man. I has murdered several pussons, burned houses an' barns, an' committed many thefts and burglaries. Widin the last ten minutes I has firmly resolved to turn ober a new leaf an' become a better man. I come to dis meetin' to-night intending to sot fiah to an orphan asylum on my way home, but I has been brought to realize what a wicked pusson I am, and de orphans are safe. I hope dat all my fellow-murderers, an' thieves, an' embezzlers in dis club will jine wid me to-night in walkin' de road dat leads to reform."

There was a good deal of silence around when Pullback sat down, and it was noticed that the President picked up a piece of chalk and made a memorandum on the floor beside his left foot. The opinion of the members, so far as learned, was that Pullback gave himself away too much. In the several other speeches which followed no one charged himself with anything more serious than horse-stealing, and, strangely enough, the chap who took Sir Isaac's umbrella didn't own up to a single thing.

MISCELLANEOUS.

No routine business was transacted at the meeting, and at 10 o'clock, after the glee club had rendered several old ballads in a taking way, refreshments were indulged in, and everybody was at liberty to move about and converse. No gifts were exchanged, though there was much hand-shaking and many expressions worth at least 150 cents on the dollar.

The Professor at the Boarding House Table.

"I see," said the professor, biting off three-quarters of his muffin and dipping the rest in his coffee, "that the newspapers are discussihg the question, 'Does Lying Pay.' What do you think of it, Mrs. Fogg?"

"Well," replied the landlady, with a sarcastic smile lighting up her severe features, "I have had nothing but lying from you for the past four weeks, and it don't pay me. I think you had better board elsewhere."

"Yes," said the professor, pouring the contents of the cream jug over his oatmeal, "I frequently have."

"Frequently have what?" asked Mrs. Fogg.

"Had better board elsewhere," replied the professor.

And the coolness which then arose between landlady and tenant was so severe that those who sat between them had their ears frost bitten.

HOUSEHOLD.

Notes.

LEMON TEA.—Place in each cup a lump or two of sugar, a slice of lemon and a little extra juice, and some small pieces of ice; fill up the cup with cold tea. Ice can be broken in small pieces by placing a lump in a piece of coarse, strong cloth, and pounding it with a mallet.

PEPPER SAUCE RELISH.—Chop onions fine, let soak half an hour in weak salt water; put in a strainer cloth and squeeze dry; to each teacupful of onion add a heaping teaspoonful of white pepper (black is as good but don't look well) and mix, put in a pickle well and cover with vinegar.

MILK CUSTARD.—Soak a bit of rennet over night in a tablespoonful of water. In the morning, warm as much milk as you will need, pour it in an earthen dish, add the rennet water and a pinch of salt, stir the milk well, let it stand until it thickens, then set in as cold a place as you have. Eat sugar and milk or cream on it, using any flavoring you like.

REFRESHING DRINK.—Pour one quart of boiling water on one and one-half pounds of sugar, one-half pint of molasses, two ounces of tartaric acid, and half an ounce of essence of sassafras. When cold, bottle and cork tight and keep in a cool place. When wanted to use, take three teaspoonfuls of this syrup in three-fourths of a tumbler of water, put in one-fourth of a teaspoonful of soda, stir and drink immediately.

TO PRESERVE EGGS.—According to Mittheilungen Landwirthschafti, vaseline is a good preservative for eggs. The eggs should be thoroughly washed and rubbed with vaseline previously melted with three-tenths per cent. of salicylic acid. The operation should be performed twice, the latter one month after the former. On boiling the skin of vaseline easily separates from the eggs. Eggs thus treated are said to keep perfectly fresh for a year

COFFEE AND EGG FOR SICK PERSONS.—A sick person wanting nourishment and having lost appetite, can often be sustained by the following, when nothing else could be taken: Make a strong cup of coffee, adding boiling milk as usual, only sweetening rather more; take an egg, beat yolk and white together thoroughly; boil the coffee, milk and sugar together, and pour it over the beaten egg in the cup you are going to serve it in. This simple receipt is used frequently in hospital practice

Convenient Home Drections.

IRON RUST.—This may be removed by salt mixed with a little lemon juice.

MILDEW.—Remove mildew by dipping in sour buttermilk and laying in the sun.

REMOVING GREASE FROM SILK.—Apply a little magnesia to the wrong side, and the spots will disappear.

INK STAINS.—Ink stains may sometimes be taken out by smearing with hot tallow, left on when the stained articles go to wash.

FRUIT STAINS.—Freezing will take out all old fruit stains, and scalding with boiling water will remove those that have never been through the wash.

WRINKLED SILK.—It may be rendered nearly as beautiful as when new by sponging the surface with a weak soution of gum arabic or white glue; then iron on the wrong side.

TO CLEAN WALL PAPER.—A friend who has tried it writes us: "Wal papers are readily cleansed by tying a soft cloth cover over a broom and sweeping down the walls carefully."

DRYING UMBRELLAS.—Most people dry their umbrellas handle upwards. This concentrates the moisture at the tip where it is closed, rusts the wire which secures the stretchers, and rots the cloth. After the umbrella is drained, it is better to invert it, and dry it in that position.

TO CLEAN SILVER.—Cleansing silver is not an easy task; the use of kerosene will greatly facilitate the operation. Wet a flannel cloth in the oil, dip in dry whiting, and thoroughly rub the plated or silverware; throw it into a dish of scalding soapsuds, wipe with a soft flannel and polish with a chamois skin.

TO REMOVE STAINS FROM THE HANDS.—A few drops of oil vitriol (sulphuric acid) in water, will take the stains of fruit off dark dyes, stove blacking, etc., from the hands without injuring them. Care must, however, be taken not to drop it upon clothes. It will remove the color from woolen, and eat holes in cotton fabrics.

TO CLEAN PAINT.—Save the tea leaves for a few days, then steep them in a tin pail or pan for half an hour, strain through a sieve and use the tea to wash off varnished paint. Whiting is unequaled for cleaning white paint. Take a small quantity on a damp flannel, rub lightly over the surface, and you will be surprised at its effects.

RENOVATING FEATHER BEDS.—Old feather beds and pillows are greatly improved by putting them on a clean grass plot during a heavy shower; let the beds become thoroughly wetted; turn them on both side. Let them lie out until thoroughly dry, then beat them with rods; this will lighten the feathers and make them much more healthy to sleep on. It removes dust and rejuvenates the feathers

TO REMOVE TIGHT RINGS.—To remove tightly-fitting rings from a finger without pain, pass the end of a portion of rather fine twine underneath the ring, and evenly encircle the finger from below upwards (as whip-makers bind lashes on) with the remainder, as far as the center of the finger, then unwind the string from above downward by taking hold of the end passed under the ring, and it will be found that the ring will gradually pass along the twine toward the tip of the finger.

To Tell the Age of Eggs.

We recommend the following process (which has been known for some time, but has been forgotten) for finding out the age of eggs and distinguishing those that are fresh from those that are not. This method is based upon the decrease in the density of egg as they grow old:

Dissolve two ounces of salt in a pint of water. When a fresh-laid egg is placed in this solution it will descend to the bottom of the vessel, while one that has been laid on the day previous will not quite reach the bottom.

If the egg be three days old it will swim in the liquid, and if it is more than three days old it will float on the surface, and project above the latter more and more in proportion as it is older.

Rules for Living Well.

If living well consists in living neither luxuriously nor expensively, in what, then, lies the secret? And how may the man of moderate means take advantage of it? The question is not a difficult one to answer. We will put the answer in the shape of a few short rules:

1. Buy with judgment.
2. Buy the best, for the best is always the cheapest.
3. Let your economy regulate the quantity, not the quality.
4. Let your cook be a cook, and one that knows how to utilize what is now thrown to the dogs, or otherwise wasted.
5. Study simplicity in the number of the dishes, and variety in the character of the meals.
6. Let the housewife be watchful enough to trace the leaks that are liable to spring in every larder.
7. Let the mistress be indeed the head of her own household and of her own kitchen.

Modern Courtship on the Half Shell.

"And you really love me dearly?" he asked, as he coiled his arm around her wasp-like system. "And you'll always love me so?"

"Always, Frederick; ever so."

"And you will pledge me to sew but—"

"Sir?"

"You pledge me to so beautify my life that it will always be as happy as now?"

"With my last breath, Frederick."

"And, darling, you will mend my soc—"

"Your what, sir?"

"You will mend my social ways and draw me upward and onward to a better existence?"

It will be the pride of my love so to do, Frederick. I will sacrifice all for your complete happiness."

"I hope that, my sweet. But suppose some accident should happen to—to—to, say, the trou—"

"To the what?"

"To the troussean; would it defer the hour which makes you mine?"

"Never, Frederick. I am yours, mind and heart, and naught can separate us."

"But what I want to say is that should my pant—"

"Begone, sir! What do you mean?"

"Hear me, my life! I say, if my panting bosom should grow cold in death would your love still warm it?"

"As the sun melts the iceberg, Frederick, so would the rays of my affection thrill your heart again."

"And you will care for me ever, my soul, and I for you, for though I may never have a shir—"

"Enough! Leave me forever!"

"But listen. Though I may not have a shirking disposition, I shall sometimes, perhaps, in the struggle of life, forget the plain duty—"

"And I'll remind you of it, Frederick, in tender actions, and make the duties of existence so pleasant of performance that to avoid them will be pain."

And so on. That's modern courtship. Lots of abstract swash, but a manifest disinclination to contemplate such possibilities as buttons, trousers and shirts.

A Pertinent Inquiry.

Grace and Teddy had a grand fight a few evenings ago Grace took Ted's canton flannel elephant away from him and wouldn't give it back. Ted ran at his sister like a tow-headed fury, and Grace gave him a sounding slap on the face. Ted's cries brought their mother to the scene of action, and she carried him off to bed, leaving the aggressor Grace in possession of the field. Ted explained matters to the ear of maternal sympathy as he was being put to bed.

"Well, Grace was naughty," said the mother, as she put on Ted's nightgown. "I'll have to talk to her about it. But you must forgive her, Teddy. And you must pray for her, too," she added, as Ted bumped down on his knees in his usual devotional attitude.

"Just let me go down and give her one good slap first like she gave me," said Ted wrathfully.

"Oh, no, darling; go on with your prayers," said the mother softly, smoothing his hair with her hand. "The Bible says we must pray for those who despitefully use us."

"Mamma," asked Ted, earnestly lifting his face. "Mamma, did you ever try it?"

On the Threshold.

BY A. H. BALDWIN.

Ring out, O bells! ring silver-sweet o'er hill and moor and fell!
In mellow echoes let your chimes their hopeful story tell.
Ring out, ring out, all-jubilant, this joyous, glad refrain:
"A bright new year, a glad new year, hath come to us again!"

Ah! who can say how much of joy within it there may be Stored up for us who listen now to your sweet melody!
Good-bye, Old Year! Tried, trusty friend, thy tale at last is told.
O New Year! write thou thine for us in lines of brightest gold.

The flowers of spring must bloom at last, when gone the winter's snow;
God grant that after sorrow past, we all some joy may know.
Though tempest-tossed our barque awhile on Life's rough waves may be,
There comes a day of calm at last, when we the haven see.

Then ring, ring on, O pealing bells! there's music in the sound.
Ring on, ring on, and still ring on, and wake the echoes round,
The while we wish, both for ourselves and all whom we hold dear,
That God may gracious be to us in this the bright New Year!

A Single Trial

Is all that is needed to prove that Polson's Nerviline is the most rapid and certain remedy in the world for pain. It only costs 10 cents for a trial bottle. A single trial bottle will prove Nerviline to be equally efficacious as an external remedy, and for pain of every description it has no equal. Try a 10 cent sample bottle. Sold by druggists. Large bottles 25 cents. Avoid substitutes.

"Little boy, beware," said a long-suffering Benedict to a little six-year-old friend. "The kind lady who gives you gingerbread to-day, when you come over to play with her little boys and girls, may be your mother-in-law some day in the rosy future."

How to Become Happy.

Many young persons are ever thinking over some new ways of adding to their pleasures. They always look for chances for more "fun," more joy.

Once there was a wealthy and powerful king, full of care and very unhappy. He heard of a man famed for his wisdom and piety, and found him in a cave on the borders of a wilderness.

"Holy man," said the king, "I come to learn how I may be happy."

Without making a reply, the wise man led the king over a rough path till he brought him in front of a high rock, on the top of which an eagle had built her nest.

"Why has the eagle built her nest yonder?"

"Doubtless," answered the king, "that it may be out of danger."

"Then imitate the bird," said the wise man; "build thy home in heaven, by trusting in Jesus, and thou shalt have peace and happiness."

That Italian Burglar.

A Dutchman named Hans was standing on the sidewalk in front of his residence, when a neighbor, Moses, happened to pass by.

"Vell, Hans, how you vas?" inquired the namesake of the great law-giver.

"I don'd feel some bedder in my mindt."

"Vat vas dose tronble mid you?"

"Vy, shoost before I gid home dis efe ning mein vife she vas attackted by dat cerebro spinal mannigitis, und she vas predy nearly mos' dead already."

"Oh, dat Italian burglar! He ought to be hung for life! Did he attack mid a hammer, or mid a shtick? Ter villan! I subbose he gid avay mid all her shewelry!"

"No," said the housemaid, "I don't apologize to a man when I throw a bucket of water down the front steps to wash 'em and he comes along and gets drenched. I've tried apologizing, but I've found there's nothing you can say to a man in that case which will satisfy him."

Catarrh, Catarrhal Deafness and Hay Fever.

Sufferers are not generally aware that these diseases are contagious, or that they are due to the presence of living parasites in the lining membrane of the nose and eustachian tubes. Microscopic research, however, has proved this to be a fact, and the result is that a simple remedy has been formulated whereby catarrh, catarrhal deafness and hay fever are cured in from one to three simple applications made at home. A pamphlet explaining this new treatment is sent free on receipt of stamp by A. H. Dixon & Son, 303 King Street West, Toronto, Canada.

MARKDALE, JAN. 6. 1886,

Mt. Forest rejoices in having secured electric light for the town.

—Present indications point strongly to war in the East at an early date.

—Michael Davitt was married to Miss Minnie Yore in Oakland, Cal., last Thursday.

75,000 is said to have changed hands by betting in the late election for mayor in Toronto.

Montreal's great winter carnival will be held February 7th to 12th. Great preparations are now being made for the monster affair.

—Mr. J. C. Black, son of the late Mr. John Black, of this village, was elected President of "the Commercial Travellers Association of Canada," at the annual meeting in Toronto last week.

THE ELECTIONS.

—The excitement over the various elections is now over, and we trust peace and harmony will again reign supreme. Seldom are we called upon to choose as many candidates and record as many votes in the same length of time as the past week; first the Ontario Elections, then School Trustees and then the Municipal, and village Police Trustees.

Our Markdale School trustee election was an interesting one, as we noted last week.

Our police trustee contest created more than ordinary interest for such an occasion, resulting in the election of E, Davis, A. Turner and S. J. Coleman.

In Glenelg the interest was up to the average, with a grater number of candidates than usual, no less than ten being in the contest, the Reeve, Mr. Moffat, was elected by acclamation, J. A. McMillan was elected Deputy-reeve by 29 majority over Jas. Skeene, while Christie Williams, Geo. Lamb and N. G. Dunsmore led the poll in the order given for councillors.

In Artemesia Dr. Christoe was elected by a majority of 246 over Mr. Elliott. This township elects the council by wards, and the council elects its deputy. J. Boland beat W McLoughry by 40 votes, Sharp got ahead of Pickle 8, and Cairns came out 4 ahead of McKee, while Priceville ward elected J. McArthur by acclamation.

Holland township had a hot contest over the reeveship, resulting in the election of Dr. Oldham by 127 over his opponent Mr. Cameron. A. Shute went in without opposition. Galbraith and Howey were re-elected while T. Williscroft, one of the best old members was left, John Murray, getting his place.

Toronto—Mayor—Howland by 2166 majority.

Owen Sound—Mayor—Duncan Morrison.

Collingwood township—T. McKenny, Reeve.

Osprey—A. McGirr, Reeve, A. McIntyre deputy-reeve—Council, Hudson Speers and Taylor.

Dundalk Village—Peter McGregor, Reeve—Council, Gardiner, McConnell, Morrow and Ketchum.

Durham—D. Jackson, Mayor; G. McKeghnie, Reeve.

Meaford—C. R. Sing, Mayor; Robt. Agnew, Reeve.

Mt. Forest—J. A. Halstead, Mayor J. Hampton, Reeve.

Amabel—James Allen, Reeve.

GLENELG AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY.

Next Thursday the annual meeting will be held in this village at 2 o'clock and it is desirable that there is a good attendance.

The Society is in a healthy condition yet we can see no reason why its usefulness and importance may not be increased ten-fold. Why not take hold and make the fall Show such an Exhibition as Collingwood; ther's nothing to hinder but a want of enterprise on the part of our buriness men and that of our leading agriculturists.

There isn't a show worth speeking of in the whole district, and as Markdale is in the centre of this large and prosperous agricultural county, and its railway and other advantages so desirable, we think the time has come to make a united and vigorous moye: Let there be a large attendance at the annual meeting so that the matter may be discussed:

Ladies troubled with Pimples, Blotches Rough Hands or Face, or Sores of any discription, should use McGregor & Parke's Carbolic Cerate. It will leave the skin in perfect health, smooth, clean and good color. Be sure and get the genuine, made by McGregor & Parke. Price 25c. Sold at R. L. Stephen's Drug Store, Markdale. 3

How to Choose A Wife.

In the first place, a young man should look well to his family connections, and choose one his equal, if not better, but never go below his own station in life—that is, morally. He should pay strict attention to the physical conditions of the one he chooses as his partner in life, for health is wealth to the nations of the earth. He should also find out what qualifications, if possible, she has for doing things in general about a house. Be sure you get one who is religously inclined, and who knows more about the Lord's Prayer than she does about balls and dances, and who can train and bring up children in the way they should go, so that when they become men and women they will be a credit to their parents. Nine out of ten of our great statesmem haye been bronght up by their mothers side. A good wife is the boast of a husband, and a good mother the pride of a son.

McGREGOR & PARKE'S CARBOLIC CERATE.

Have you an old Sore, Cut, Burn, Bruise, Corn, Bunion, Salt Rheum, Pimples, Blotches, Rough Hands or Face? If so, there is but one cure, namely, McGregor & Parke's Carbolic Cerate. If you but try it, it will convince you. It costs 25c. at R. L. Stephen's Drug Store, Markdale. 2

Have you ever tried McGregor & Park's Carbolic Cerate for sores of any kind? It is beyond doubt the very best preparation in the market for healing and curing Sores Bourns, Cuts, Pimples, Blotches, and is th only proper method of applying Carbolic Acid Sold at R. L. Stephen's Drug Store, Markdale, for 25 cents per box. 1

From our own correspondent.

THE Annual Sabbath School Anniversary of the Methodist Church here on New-Years evening was well patronized. After tea had been served the program was entered upon. The first part sustained by the children we thought rather lengthy. Most of the children delivered their parts well, but owing to considerable disturbance by some ill behaved young men and women in the rear of the church, some of the little ones could not be heard. The second part of the program being a Cantata by the Choir, was a choice selection but owing to too short preperation was poorly rendered. The Choir has done and is capable of doing very much better with a little attention to practices.

The Secretary's report showed the school to be in a most flourishing condition.

A social held in the basement of the Church on Monday evening was very well attended and an enjoyable evening to all was spent.

Rev. Mr. Cornish, Chairman of the District preached the Anniversary Sermon of the Sabbath School on Sunday evening, the subject, "Early Conversion" the Rev. gentlemans discourse was listened to with close attention.

Miss Ganton, of Oakville, has been engaged by the Trustees of Flesherton Public School, as Teacher for the junior department, vacated by Miss Hopkins. She entered upon the duties here on Monday last.

Monday election day wasan exciting time here the contest for Reeve was calm not many here feared the results of the days ballott between Dr. Christoe and Mr. Elliott.

The struggle was hard between Mr. Pickell and W. Sharp, the latter being elected by 8, while it was still closer in Eugenia, Mr. Cairns having but 4 over McKee.

Mr. Boland elected in the North by a large majority, thus we haye Reeve and two Councillors re-elected and 2 seats filled by new members; we wish tnem all "A Happy New Year."

From a Correspondent.

On the evening of Friday. Dec 24th a tea-meeting was held in the Presbyterian Church, which lately has been much improved by the addition of chandeliers, carpet, and other improvements. The tea was as usual, and afterwards an interesting "program" was given. Receipts $36.

On the evening following above that is, Christmas night, the annual tea under the auspices of the Methodist Church was given in the church and hall adjoining the parsonage ground. The weather was simply grand and the attendance was quite large. Receipts $46.

Mr. Charles Drummond our teacher for this year (1887) is now in town. He comes well recommended, and we wish him every success. His sister Miss Annie, teaches S. S. No. 8 (known as Milne's School) this year. She also has our best wishes.

Our school closed on Thursday afternoon, Dec. 23 with a public examination There was an attendance of about 40 visitors, several of whom were teachers and two of them the resident ministers. The several classes were examined, and all seemed to give satisfaction. Towards the end of the afternoon Mr. Wesley Long, a trustee, interrupted proceedings and said that as the teacher was just going to leave, an address and presentation was to be given. The address was read by one of the pupils and a beautiful and valuable writing-desk was presented by another, Mr. Chant replied as well as he could, being overcome with emotion. Afterwards short addresses were given by others present, and Rev. Mr. Ferrier closed with prayer. Mr. Chant stayed here 3 years, and he will be missed in the Sunday School and Church as well as the public School. His attendance for the last half year of 1886 was 53, so I learn--He leaves to attend St. Catherines Collegiate Inst. to prepare for 1st year's Examination in Toronto University,

HEALTH.

Catarrh.

Catarrhs should receive careful consideration, instead of the neglect which they generally meet with until they have fastened on the part affected so much as to excite the attention, and perhaps alarm, of the sufferer. Here, however, we propose to say a few words about the causes of chills.

A person in good health, with fair play, easily resists cold. But when the health flags a little, and liberties are taken with the stomach or the nervous system, a chill is easily taken, and accordingly to the weak spot of the individual assumes the form of a cold, or pneumonia, or, it may be, jaundice. Of all causes of "cold," probably fatigue is one of the most efficient. A jaded man coming home at night from a long day's work, a growing youth losing two hour's sleep over evening parties two or three times a week, a young lady "heavily doing the season," and young children at this festive season overfed, and with a short allowance of sleep, are common instances of victims of "cold."

Luxnry is favorable to chill taking. Very hot rooms, soft chairs, and feather beds create a sensitiveness that leads to catarrhs. It is not, after all, the "cold" that is so much to be feared as the antecedent conditions that give the attack a chance of doing harm. Some of the worst colds happen to those who do not leave the house, or even their beds; and those who are most exposed to changes of temperature, and who, by good sleep, cold bathing, and regular habits preserve the tone of their nervous system and circulation.

Probably a good many chills are contracted at night or at the fag end of the day, when tired people get the equilibrium of their circulation disturbed by either overheated sitting-rooms or underheated bedrooms and beds. This is especially the case with elderly people. In such cases, the mischief is not done instantaneously, or in a single night. It often takes places insidiously, extending over days or even weeks. It thus appears that "taking cold" is not by any means a simple result of a lower temperature, but depends largely on personal conditions and habits affecting especially the nervous and muscular energy of the body.—London Lancet.

This discussion of catarrh and its causes in this high medical authority is a fair sample of medical opinion on this vexed question. It would certainly be difficult to avoid a cold on any specific wisdom contained in the article.

Colds are superinduced by a superabundance of carbon in the circulation. Those persons who are members of the English vegetarian society are scarcely troubled with colds or catarrh. Fruits and grains are as much superior to the vegetarian diet as it is to the commonly accepted one.

Good building material, with care as to quantity, and a daily bath with the usual exercise, will relegate these diseases to remote parts. We must learn to live, then we shall be exempt from all illness.

An Avalanche.

"How are they brought into desolation as in a moment."—Psalmist.

Alpine tourists covet the sight of a descending avalanche. High up the slope of the Wengem Alps, facing the lofty Jungfrau, with its crown of perpetual snow, is a little inn for the purpose of accommodating those who desire to see the mid-summer avalanches crashing down all before it on the opposite side.

The silky, floss-like snowflakes which fall upon this mountain are as harmless as they are beautiful in moderate quantities. But when they fall in such excess of the quantity required for useful purposes, they form the basis for dangerous, death-dealing consequences.

So with our food-supply. If we eat in sufficient moderation of properly selected food, it is capable of being changed into the highest form of vitalized tissues, affording energy for the muscles and mental force for the nerves. But, if the food be taken in too large quantity, it is, not only insufficiently endowed with vitality derived from the vital fluids while sleeping in the stomach and the oxygen of the air taken into the lungs, but the vicious excess clogs up the minute capillaries and loads the blood with impurities which endanger not only the health, but the life of the individual; thus becoming an avalanche of destruction to all of the possibilities of life. Our health, our enjoyments, our power to help our friends, to help ourselves, and, ultimately, our very lives. "Too much food" should be written down as emphatically the course of ill health; and "abstemiousness" the proper remedy for all the diseases to which weak and erring humanity is heir—a simple and inexpensive, though most efficient remedy.

Pure Air at Night.

The season of the year is now here in which doors and windows are usually closed, and the matter of pure air becomes one of serious importance. During the day, the air of living-rooms is pretty certain to be changed more or less by the frequent opening of outside doors. During the night, however, not infrequently all outside openings are tightly closed, and the occupants of sleeping-rooms might almost as well place themselves for the eight or ten sleeping hours of night in an air-tight box.

In the morning, persons who thus deprive themselves of life-giving oxygen, the great necessity of life, awake unrefreshed and dispirited, languid, pale and weak, with headache, giddiness, no appetite, and many other symptoms of the foul air poisoning to which the system has been subjected. This accounts for a very large part of the colds and other forms of physical wretchednees of which a good many complain at this season of the year, and which is ordinarily ascribed to the change of season. The system is filled with impurities as a result of deficient oxygenation of the blood, and so the body becomes in a high degree susceptible to all causes of vital disturbance. The reception of a few fever germs is all-sufficient to bring on a violent illness, by setting fire to the fever-feeding material with which the tissues are filled as the result of deficient air cleansing.

Ventilation of living-rooms is of great importance at all times, but the supply of an ample amount of fresh air to sleeping-rooms is doubly important during the hours of sleep.

Cure for Rheumatism.

A gentleman who was the victim of an acute attack of rheumatism sends us the following, which he declares effectually cured him. Health Notes.

A Maine doctor says bilious fever is a mild yellow fever.

The best promoters of health are, fresh air and sunlight.

Bran poultice is said to be an infallible cure for poison-ivy.

A simple remedy for neuralgic headache is the juice of a lemon taken in a cup of black coffee.

Changes of dress from thick to thin should always be made in the morning, as then all the vital forces are in full play.

It is not always necessary to have teeth extracted when they ache. The nerve may be diseased and the tooth still perfectly sound.

In a case of slight sore throat, let a little powdered borax be placed on the tongue, and allowed to dissolve and run down the throat.

"Enough is as good as a feast." Remember that it is better to leave the table a little hungry than to suffer the pangs of indigestion after eating heartily.

The habit of continual spitting which attends the chewing of tobacco and gums, induces debility, not only of the salivary glands, but of the system generally.

Russia's Ambition.

There can be little doubt that the disturbances which have marked events in Bulgaria during the past weeks are an incident of the ancient ambition of of Russia to get possession of Constantinople. Those who read the history of Russia during the past forty years will perceive that she has been almost continuously, in one way or another, aiming at this prize.

It is a Russian tradition that the Czar, Peter the Great, who really built up the present empire, and made it a European, instead of an Asiatic State, left in his will an injunction upon his successors, to attempt by every means to acquire the Turkish capital. Many poeple doubt if Peter ever made such a will; but it is quite certain that his successors have acted as if it existed, and as if they were resolved to obey its command.

The ambition of Russia to make Constantinople a Russian city, is the key, probably, to all her foreign policy and military movements.

She entered upon the Crimean War, and then upon the war of 1877, with tho resolute purpose of cosquering the Turk, and raising aloft the Russian doubled-headed eagle on the banks of the Bosphorus. In both cases she failed, owing to the opposition, mainly, of Great Britain. There are many persons who think that the Russian advance in Central Asia towards India is really meant to overawe and checkmate the English, and by threatening the English empire in the East, to make England powerless to resist the conquest of Constantinople.

It is this ambition of Russia to obtain the ancient seat of the eastern Roman empire which leads her to interfere so often and so persistently in the affairs of the little States which lie between the Russian frontier and the dominions of the Sultan.

She asserts that she freed the Bulgarians from Turkish tyranny eight years ago; and this she regards as entitling her to say how and by whom Bulgaria shall be ruled. The Bulgarian Prince, Alexander, showed signs of wishing to make his principality a really independent State; and Russia, fearing to love her hold there, caused Alexander to abandon his throne.

Now that he has abdicated, Russia seems determined to decide in fact,—though under the treaty of Berlin she cannot do so except in concert with the other Powers,—who shall be his successor. The Czar even opposed the selection of Prince Waldemar, of Denmark, the Czarina's own brother, for the place, apparently more because he was the choice of the Bulgarian Parliament than because the Czar distrusted the Prince.

The other small kingdoms, Roumania, Servia and Greece, were formerly very friendly to Russia. But the events of the past ten years have arroused in them all ambitions which are inconsistent with those of the Czar. They now look with dread upon the prospect of the extension of the great, despotic empire of Russia to the Bosphorus and the Ægean; and feel that their own existence as independent kingdoms would not endangered by such an event.

Meanwhile, we cannot doubt that Russia purpose is always and resolutely the same as it has been for two hundred years. As the Sultan's power becomes more and more feeble, as he sinks more hopelessly in debt, as his Government becomes more corrupt and incapable, the impatience of Russia to absorb European Turkey becomes evidently greater.

It is certain that what has prevented Russia during the last three months from once more pushing her legions across the Pruth, and speeding them towards the Balkans in a march of conquest, has been the restraining influence of Germany, added to the fear that another great alliance in opposition to her ambitions aim might be made in Europe.

Russia watches and waits for a golden opportunity to come. When she has money and men enough, when matters are ripe among the Balkan States, when Germany is no longer hostile to her design, when she sees no reason to fear the arms of England or of Austria, then, we may be sure, the errand which failed in 1854, and again in 1877, will be once more entered upon.

Lariat Bill—The Engineer's Story.

Well, stranger, 'twas somewhar in 'sixty-nine
I were runnin' the Frisco fast express
An' from Murder Creek to Blasted Pine,
Were nigh onto eighteen mile, I guess,
The road were a down-grade all the way,
An' we pulled out of Murder a little late,
So I opened the throttle wide that day,
And a mile a minute was 'bout our gait.

My fireman's name were Lariat Bill,
A quiet man with an easy way,
Who could rope a steer with a cowboy's skill,
Which he'd learned in Texas, I've heard him say;
The coil were strong as tempered steel,
An' it went like a bolt from a crossbow flung,
An' arter Bill changed from saddle to wheel,
Just over his head in the cab it hung.

"Well, as I were sayin', we fairlyly flew
As we struck the curve at Buffalo Spring,
An' I gave her full steam an' put her through,
An' the engine rocked like a living thing;
When all of a sudden I got a scare—
For thar on the track were a little child!
An' right in the path of the engine there
She held out her little hand and smiled!

"I jerked he lever and whistled for brakes,
The wheels threw sparks like a shower of gold;
But I knew the trouble a down grade makes,
An' I set my teeth an' my flesh grew cold.
Then Lariat Bill yanked his long lassoo,
An' out on the front of the engine crept—
He balanced a moment before he threw,
Then out in the air his lariat swept!"

He paused. There were tears in his honest eyes;
The stranger listened with bated breath.
"I know the rest of the tale," he cries;
"He snatched the child from the jaws of death!
'Twas the deed of a hero, from heroes bred,
Whose praises the very angels sing!"
The engineer shook his grizzled head,
And growled: "He didn't do no sich thing.

He aimed at the stump of a big pine tree,
An' the lariat caught with a double hitch,
An' in less than a second the train an' we
Were yanked off the track an' inter the ditch!
'Twere an awful smash, an' it laid me out,
I ain't forgot it, and never shall:
"Were the passengers hurt?" Lemme see—about—
Yes, it killed about forty—but saved the gal!"

Don't Be too Positive.

Boys, don't be too certain. Remember that nothing is easier than to be mistaken; and if you permit yourself to be so very positive in your mistakes a great many times, everybody will lose confidence in what you say. Never make a positive statement unless you know it is as you say. If you have any doubts, or if there is room for any, remove the possibility by examination before speaking, or speak cautiously. Don't be too certain. "John, where is the hammer?" "It is in the corn crib." "No, it is not there; I have just been looking there." "Well, I know it is; I saw it there not half an hour ago." "If you saw it there, it must be there, of course; but suppose you go and fetch it." John goes to the corn-crib, and presently returns with a small axe in his hand. "Oh, it was the axe I saw; the handle was sticking out from a half-bushel measure; I thought it was the hammer." But you said positively that you did see the hammer, not that you thought you saw it. There is a great difference between the two answers. Do not permit yourself to make a positive statement even about a small matter unless you are quite sure; for if you do you will find the habit growing upon you, and by-and-by you will begin to make loose replies to questions of great importance. Don't be to certain.

Little Wifey—"Then there were two great painters and two great authors and an eminent tragedian and—you! What a gathering together of congenial souls!" He—"Yes; rather too many of us, I thought, when there was only dinner enough for four."

Ruined by Strikers.

The failure the other day in Boston of one of the largest New England boot and shoe manufacturers is calculated to make thoughtful people pause and reflect. The failure is significant because it was due not to speculation or defalcation, but simply to the inability of a thoroughly competent and conscientious business man to conduct his large factory at the dictation of his employees. For three years previous the proprietor had been laboring under great disadvantages, being compelled to pay larger wages than the business would warrant, but which he was unable to reduce owing to the fact of his workmen being under the control of the labor agitators of the country.

Mr. Martin has, according to unprejudiced report, been one of the most liberal employers of labor, and always manifested a conscientious concern for the welfare of his men. On several occasions, when trade was dull, rather than close down the factory or reduce the men, he had made up stock ahead. There was, of course, considerable risk in doing this, as prices might have decreased and a serious loss been entailed.

It appears that the causes leading to the failure were really the result of the efforts of the firm to give employment to all their men during the months of last winter.

Mr. Martin states that a year ago he had an interview with the foreman of his largest factory, which is in the town of Hudson, where he has been manufacturing about 3,500 pairs of shoes a day, giving employment to between 400 and 500 persons. He asked his foreman to call together the men who were idle and ask them if they would consent to return to work at 10 per cent. less than they had been receiving. The men declined the offer and Mr. Martin, after consideration, from motives of humanity, said that he would make another effort and would put the men to work at the former prices rather than let them suffer during the winter months. He stocked up in his store at No. 12 High-st., Boston, 150,000 pairs of boots and shoes, and waited for the spring trade to enable him to dispose of this large stock. When trade opened he made a contract to deliver 5,000 cases of shoes in the West, but as soon as his men learned of it, they demanded another increase. This compelled him to fill the contract at a loss.

"It is simple folly," he says, "for a man to attempt to run his business at the dictation of others, and the laboring classes will learn by and by that the demagogues who urge them on to demand more than the manufacturers can afford to pay are not their friends. The fact is, I believe that a crisis is near at hand when this bad system will be broken up, and men will see that if they would consult their own interests, they must have some respect for the interest of their employers."

New Year's, 1887.

BY L. A. MORRISON, TORONTO.

"He giveth the years."

The years are His gifts for our using,
They are ours by the grace of His love,
And are blessings to us by our choosing.
To live for the crowning above.

The years are for us what we make them,
For each day has a blessing in store,
And each hour has its gifts if we take them,
And Heaven has eternally more.

The years are our days of probation,
Let us then in the name of the Lord,
With full faith and with glad adoration,
Live always as taught by His Word.

He Was the One Green Spot.

Edith—"What a lonesome spot a social gathering is where one is such a stranger!"

Harold—"It is indeed, 'pon honor, doncher know."

Edith—"I don't know what I should have done but for you. Your are the oasis of the evening's desert."

Harold—"Really I am beholden to you, Miss Edith."

Edith—"Yes, dear Harold, you are the evening's oasis—the one green spot in all the dreary waste."

CLOVIS COAT.

The size for fourteen years will require six yards and five-eighths of goods twenty-four inches wide, or three yards and five-eighths of goods forty-eight inches wide. One yard of contrasting material twenty-four inches in width, or one-half yard of goods forty-eight inches in width, will trim as illustrated. Patterns in sizes for from twelve to sixteen years. Price twenty-five cents each.

FARM.

One of the benefits of manual training is the making of manual labor honorable. In all the past, even to the present, manual labor has been regarded as servile, and therefore degrading; and many a youth, who might have been a useful citizen in some skilled employment has led a relatively worthless life on the outskirts of a profession, or mercantile occupation, for which he had neither taste nor fitness.

Some horses appear to be born with the kicking propensity largely developed; others acquire the habit, and do not readily part with it. To prevent such horses from doing injury to other animals, or to persons passing behind them in the stable, some guard is required which will act as a protection without injuring the horse. The kicking rail is a pole of about four inches in diameter, and as long as the width of the stall. It is best to have it swung by two ropes, one at each end, rather than by a single rope attached to the middle. The ropes by which the pole is swung should be passed through and not around it, so as to always present a smooth surface, and be entirely free from knots; then the horse can hammer away at it to his heart's content without injuring anything or any one.

The latest novelty in plows is at present being used in Spain. It works the land to a depth of thirty inches, and turns a furrow two feet wide. It is drawn by two sixteen horse power engines. The implement is constructed on the patent balance plow principle, but of very strong proportions. It is a one furrow plow, but fitted with two skifers, the first turning a furrow sixteen inches wide and fourteen inches deep, the second following to a depth of thirty inches, and turning over a furrow twenty-four inches wide, leaving the land completely loosened to a depth of two feet six inches. Drawn by the steam-engines, the account in a foreign exchange says it is possible with this plow to turn over four acres per day. In cases where it is not necessary to turn up the land to this great depth, but simply to stir up the under-soil, all that is required is to take off the last skife, and in its place fix a subsoil tyne, which will go to the depth of twenty-four or thirty inches.

Guernseys are yearly becoming more popular among butter dairymen and farmers, and their merits make them worthy of attention. The grade Guernsey cows have produced records which are hard to excel, showing that this breed of cattle can transmit their sterling qualities to their offspring whether through full bloods or through the so-called native or common cows of the country. One of the best grade cows we ever had was the daughter of a son of the imported Guernsey bull, Sir Champion, and of a good native cow. Soon after her second calf, in June, on grass alone, she made a weekly record of sixteen and three-quarter pounds of butter, which was excellent in flavor and rich in color. This was without any forcing whatever in the way of feeding, showing that, had she been pushed with suitable food in addition to the grass supply, we might have considerably increased the record. We had other fine heifers from this Guernsey bull, but did not have their capacity tested, being fully satisfied with the total performances of the herd under ordinary good management.

A good many people drink disease and death by having out-houses too near the well. The "Annals of Hygiene" gives some timely advice on the subject, which we quote:—Let us remember that a well will drain an area, with a diameter equal to twice its depth. Therefore, a well twelve feet deep will drain an area the diameter of which is twenty-four feet, that is to say, that it will drain the surrounding soil for twelve feet in every direction. Obviously, then, the privy should be more than the depth of the well away from it, and more than this again, if it is proposed to place it on a higher level, which, however, should never be done. The well should be lined inside thoroughly with mortar, so that percolation cannot occur between the crevices of the bricks, and it should be well covered so that the surface drainage cannot get into it, for you want to drink water that has come into the well from the bottom, after it has been purified by filteration through the earth. Thus, then, these are the precautions to be observed in locating and building your well in the country. How about the city? Well water in the city should never be used; the sources of contamination are too numerous and too hidden to be avoided.

The Time Fiend.

On one of the recent cold nights a man was hastening across the common with his overcoat buttoned up to his neck. He was rather anxious to know what time it was, but he was too lazy to unbutton his coat in order to get at his watch. Just then he saw a man of well-dressed appearance coming in the distance, and remarked to himself:

"Go to! I will e'en ask yon genteel stranger what time it is, and he will unbutton his coat, pull out his watch and eke inform me of the hour of the night."

He perceived that the stranger was buttoned up just as he was. When he came up, the man who wanted to know the time touched his hat politely and said:

"Sir, do you know what time it is?"

The stranger paused, removed his right glove, unbuttoned his overcoat from top to bottom, unbuttoned his under coat, and finally pulled out his watch, while the cold wind beat against his unprotected breast.

Holding up the watch so that the light would shine on it, he scrutinzed it an instant and said:

"Yes!"

And then he passed on without word.

Too Smart for Her.

Teacher (to small boy)—"Johnny, if you had eight apples in your desk, and you should give three of them to your seat mate, how many would you have left?"

Johnny—"I won't tell yon."

Teacher—"Do you know?"

Johnny—"Yes'm; but I ain't goin' to tell you, fer ef I did you'd take 'em away from me an' eat 'em fer yer lunch."

"My ma is keepin' boarders, and among 'em is the queerest kind of a man. He just goes out in the pasture an' sits down on a log, an' takes out a piece of paper and some pencils and marks all over it. He had an awful time the other day when—" "What was he sketching?" "He wasn't catching anything, but our old black ram caught him, and that was where the fun came in, mister."

RIFT AND SPRAY,

OR,

LOVE AND VENGEANCE AMONG THE SMUGGLERS.

THE MOST FASCINATING OCEAN ROMANCE SINCE THE DAYS OF COOPER AND MARYATT.

CHAPTER XIX.—GRACE HEARS THE STORY OF MARIE'S RESCUE.

There was universal activity immediately; and Dolan was still standing by the captain when he heard a voice cry out:

"Gerald! Gerald! Brother—brother Gerald! Oh, speak to me, dear! Where are you?"

Standing like the image of a saint, in a little niche of the cavern, that overhung the water, and which communicated to its surface by some wide steps, and in the other direction of the upper cave, where we first introduced the reader to the secret haunts of the smugglers, was Grace. Her light dress and beautiful hair swayed gently in a puffy kind of wind that circled round the sides of the cavern, and her voice, like a strain of music, echoed from roof to rock, and was reflected in a strange echo from the inland sea.

"Gerald! Gerald? Where are you, Gerald?"

"Silence!" roared Captain Dolan. "What do you do here? How dare you come hither?"

"For Gerald!"

"Away with you!"

"No—no, Gerald—I want Gerald? Who will tell me of him? Oh, will none of you speak to me?"

"All right, Miss Grace," said one.

"Gerald, do you mean? Is he here? I do not see him!"

"Take the girl away! This is men's work here!" cried Dolan. "Take her away, some of you!"

"No—no! You have killed him—I know you have. I am sure you have killed him! You, Dolan, you!"

Grace uttered these words in the midst of tears and shrieks; and Dolan then cried out savagely:

"Is that the way to speak to a father?"

"Father? Father?" she said. "Oh, no—no—no father! I have no father; Gerald has no father. Oh, no, no; a father is a something so kind, so good, so full of affection and gentleness to his children; while you—you Dolan—oh, I do not want to be wicked—but you are cruel to us; and you have killed poor Gerald."

There was a sudden splash then in the dark waters of the cabin, and an oath from Dolan, and a scream from Grace, followed the plunge into the waves of Gerald from the cabin window.

"Stop him! Fire at him!" shouted Dolan. "I will!"

"No, you won't," said Martin, as he struck up the arm of Dolan; and as the pistol exploded and the bullet struck off a piece of rock from the roof of the cabin, there was a murmur of disapprobation from the crew.

Gerald swam toward the steps that led up to where Grace was standing, and the girl ran down them, slippery and slimy as they were, and with little cries of joy welcomed him and helped him from the water."

"Gerald, dear, you are well—you are not killed! Oh, I am so glad to see you, dear Gerald; and he would kill you now—now, even. Oh, it is so dreadful! That man is not our father—he cannot be. We have no father, Gerald!"

Grace clung to the dripping form of Gerald with frantic eagerness; and then the boy turned and faced Dolan.

"Coward!" he said. Murderous coward!"

"Ah. You dare?"

"Yes, I dare. You would have killed me now—you fain would take my life. You are a coward, Dolan, and you are a villain!"

A suppressed kind of yell came from the crew, and then Dolan spoke aloud.

"As regards shooting the boy, I had no such intention! It is for you, my men, whom he would have given up and betrayed to the authorities, to consider how far he merits your good offices. If you choose to take into favor the spy, the traitor, the boy who has learned to write that he might betray you all, I am content—have your own way."

"There is no occasion," said one, "to shoot the boy."

"The pistol went off by accident. If Martin had let my arm be, it would not have done so."

"That may be true, mates," said Martin.

"And as for shooting the boy," added Dolan—and the dark, malignant look came over his face in double terror—"as for shooting the boy, I would not balk myself by doing so for all my share of the plunder and profit of all our cruises. Oh, he is very safe with me."

Gerald and Grace had now reached the top of the little slippery steps together and there was some apparent intention on the part of Grace, in the excitement of the moment to say something to Dolan, but Gerald stopped.

"No, dear, no! Oh! I do not."

"I will not say a word, dear Gerald."

"That is well. I have so much to tell you, dear."

"And you are safe? You are not hurt. Gerald! You will not go again from me?"

"No—no! But we will soon leave this place, dear. To-night. to-night!

"Oh joy—joy!"

"We must to-night, but not alone!"

"Not alone, Gerald?"

"No, not alone! On board the Rift, dear, there is another one whom you will love—one who will love you so dearly, my dear Grace. This way. Come this way. We will go into the dry cavern, dear. This way."

"Yes, Gerald; but who is the one? Who will love me as you say, and go with us?"

"Oh, Grace, dear, I have such a terrible story to tell!"

"Once for all!" shouted Captain Dolan, at this moment, from the deck of the Rift—"once for all, I warn you, crew of the Rift, that if you let that boy escape from this place, your lives are not worth twenty-four hours' purchase, for he will go at once to the port admiral and betray all."

These words produced an evident commotion, and the rough voice of the second in command was heard issuing an order:

"A couple of men on a cruise in the bay! You, Jakes, and you, Peter!"

"Aye, aye!"

"Who holds watch in the ravine?" said Dolan.

"Andrews."

"John, or his brother?"

"John," said a voice.

"Well, my men, look to it! Look to it! That is all I say to you—look to it!"

"Aye—aye! we will do that!"

"But he is my son, you know; and I can't ask you to do anything to my own flesh and blood!"

There was no reply to this. But for an uneasy sensation on the minds of the men that, after all, there was a something in the whole transaction in regard to Gerald and that letter which Dolan had affected to produce, there could be no doubt but that their rage against the boy would have been quite sufficient to insure his destruction. But, as we say, there was a feeling which they probably could not well have defined, but which clung to them all, to the effect that Dolan was playing a part in the affair, and that Gerald might be innocent of the treachery he was charged with.

Hence was it that they left the boy alone; but they did not neglect to take precaution against his escape.

Now, as Gerald was very anxious to escape, these precautions were most inimical to his happiness and plunged both him and Grace into a sea of wild conjectures as to what would happen to them, and very vague projects of deliverance.

The reader is aware, though, that Gerald had other cares upon his mind as well as those connected with Grace.

That gentle and fair daughter of Captain Mocquet—that being whom he had certainly rescued from death—had become very dear to him and had, insensibly to him, wound herself closely about his heart.

She seemed so to belong to him, so completely to be his and dependent upon him since he had upheld her in the sea and saved her from the death that must have come over her that he had a feeling on his mind that henceforth no action of his life would be perfect unless she in some way should be connected with it.

And yet he loved Grace.

Dearly he loved Grace, but his heart had been taught to look upon her with the love of a sister, while the feelings that began to be awakened in his breast for the delicate and affectionate child of the French captain were of a very different nature.

And yet poor Gerald felt as if he were guilty of some treason against his proper and just affections, as now Grace held him in her arms and kissed his lips and sobbed out her joy at seeing him.

"Dear Gerald—come now and sit by me—oh! no, no, you are so wet, you will go and get dry clothes and then you will come to me. I have so much to say to you. Come soon—so very soon, dear Gerald!"

"I will, dear."

Gerald did come soon. He, too, had much to say; and his anxiety to say it was so great, that he trembled in every limb, and more than once was on the point of allowing his pent-up feeling the relief of tears.

There was a pretty nook in the chalk cavern, where hung some rich tapestries that once Dolan had brought home from a wreck, he said. It was indeed from a wreck he had brought them, but it was a wreck of his own making; and in that recess these two young and artless beings sat hand in hand; and while they heard the wash of the water in the sea-cavern, and occasionally the hoarse sound of some order, they held council together.

"Grace, dear, I have said to you that there was another."

"Yes, Gerald."

"Whom you must love!"

"You love—the—other?"

"No, yes—that is—no—not as I love you, Grace—not the same—oh! no—no!"

"Who is the other, dear Gerald?"

"Marie."

"Oh!"

"Marie Mocquet. I will tell you all. Oh! dear Grace, you will be so glad to hear it all, and you will be so kind and so good to her. I am sure you will!"

"Yes, dear!"

Grace rested her head upon the shoulder of Gerald, and then in a low, faint voice she said:

"Now, dear?"

"Now, what, Grace, dear—what?"

"Tell me all and don't ask me to—to—"

"To what, dear?"

"To say anything."

"How strange you are, Grace, dear!"

"No—no. Oh, no. I am not—I am not. No—no—no!"

Grace burst into tears and sobbed as if her heart would break. She twined herself round to his breast and clasped both her arms about his neck and so clung to him and cried—Oh! so long and bitterly.

Gerald was deeply affected.

It was long before either of them spoke and then Grace's tears ceased and her sobs came less frequently and she was able to say very quietly:

"Now—now, Gerald—now tell me."

"Yes, dear."

Then Gerald in a voice of deep emotion told her all the particulars of that, to him, terrible cruise in the Raft and how he had, at the risk of his own life, rescued from the sea the young French girl and how she had terrified Dolan and how, even then, she was in the cabin of the Rift hiding; and how her father, Captain Mocquet, was there a prisoner, whom he (Gerald) much feared Dolan meant ill to. And Grace listened to it all and still held Gerald round the neck, and when he ceased to speak and had told all she clasped him close to her and in a voice that was so low you might have supposed it to be the first faint twitter of a young bird, she said to him:

"My Gerald—my dear Gerald—I will love her; I will—I do. It was a great and gallant thing to do. God bless you, Gerald, ever and ever. God will bless you, Gerald?"

"And you, too, my dear Grace. You will not be—that is, you do not feel—"

She turned away her head slightly and then she said:

"No, no!"

She did not ask him what she should not be or what she should not feel, but that gentle "no" answered him and he clasped her closer to his breast and kissed her tenderly.

"Now, dear, he said, "what shall we do?—what can we do? We must be so prompt and so energetic. You, dear Grace, who are so clever, will think of what to do."

"Escape, dear Gerald; we must escape—soon—so soon. Each moment is full of danger now. It is you, Gerald, who are clever; you who know the most and will be able to tell me what to do."

"Would that I could, dear!"

"Grace! Grace!" cried a harsh voice at this moment.

"That is Mrs. Wagner."

"Hush!"

There was the flash of a light and the woman, who was in the confidence of Captain Dolan and who had endeavored to assume a control over Grace appeared before them.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

SCIENTIFIC AND USEFUL.

To polish nickel-plated goods after becoming black and not worn, use rouge on a rag with a little oil.

Artificial meerschaum may be made by immersing for some time carbonate of magnesia in a warm solution of silicate of soda or potash.

Domestication softens the whole organic structure. In the feathered species the feathering is not as dense nor as hard as on the wild fowl.

Sarsaparilla beer is made by dissolving one and a half ounce of compound extract of sarsaparilla with one pint of hot water; when cold, add of good pale ale seven pints.

The squeaking noise of shoes can be stopped by sprinkling powdered pumice-stone between the soles during the process of manufacture, or by driving a dozen shoe-pegs into the soles when the shoes are first to be used.

Beetles, flies, spiders, et-cætera, may be preserved for microscopic purposes by dipping in a solution of corrosive sublimate. This is however extremely poisonous, and great care must be taken in its use. Dipping them in melted paraffin preserves them from contact with air.

A horse ration: Eight pounds of bran, three pounds of corn-meal or four pounds of finished middlings, and two pounds of linseed-meal would be a good ration for a heavy work-horse to be fed upon cut hay, and would keep him in good health and strength, with a sleek coat.

According to M. Casalonga's Chronique Industrielle, the best and simplest means of removing any unpleasant smell from olive-oil consists in warming it over a moderate fire, where it should be kept for some time without allowing it to boil. The oil should be constantly stirred; it then becomes quite pure and inodorous.

Hot water is the best thing that can be used to heal a sprain or bruise. The wounded part should be pleced in water as hot as can be borne for fifteen or twenty minutes, and in all ordinary cases the pain will gradually cease. Hot water applied by means of cloths, is a sovereign remedy for neuralgia and pleurisy pains. For burns or scalds apply cloths well saturated with cool alum-water, keeping the injured parts covered from the air.

Professor Place of the Cavalry School of Saumur has recently applied electricity with great success to horses which prove refractory while being shod. It is known that a vicious beast will often give much trouble in the operation of shoeing, and may even have to be bound and made to lie down. M. Place's method renders it at once tractable, and permanently cures its aversion to the forge. The electric shock is given through a bridle of special form, from an induction-coil actuated by a dry pile.

VARIETIES.

The herring family contributes more largely to the food of the people than any other of the fish families.

The diamond trade at Antwerp has of late been largely developed. The value of the diamonds cut there every year is estimated at over one million sterling. They are exclusively Cape stones.

Till the end of last century game was stalked. To kill a bird flying was esteemed a most surprising feat; now the more difficult the shots that are presented to him the more the shooter is pleased.

There are only six surnames in the island of St. Kilda, an adjective being usually added for the more effectual definition of the person addressed. Thus, for example, there is Caelum Beag (Little Malcolm), or Donnull Og (Young Donald).

In Philadelphia women make a good living as professional "lampers." They contract to call each day and trim and keep in perfect order the lamps of the household. The metal, the chimneys, the shades, and the wicks are kept immaculate and the oil fresh, and the relief to the average housekeeper more than compensates for the slight fee required.

It appears that the English fox has changed a good many of his old-fashioned ideas and tastes out at the Antipodes. He now prefers, Dr. J. E. Taylor tells us, young lambs to poultry, and he even allows the rabbit to go scot-free. He thinks the latter too much trouble to catch, and not worth much even when caught. Consequently the English fox is assuming the natural propensities of the dingo, or native wild dog, to which he is nearly allied.

Pearls are found of all shades of colour; the rarest are those of a jet black, seldom met with, and therefore most valuable. It behoves the buyer to be most careful of whom he purchases any kind of colored pearl, as pearls are easily dyed; but the color is not lasting and can be easily detected by an expert or even through the aid of a hand-magnifier. But the rosy colour and the lovely "orient" of the pink pearl will at once strike the most casual observer, and, when the pearl is mounted with brilliants and white pearls, forms a most exquisite harmony of color and good taste.

Affectionate.

They do say, as a redeeming point in the character of the King of Dahomey, that he is fond of children, having three hundred and forty-two of his own. He likes them best fat, and stewed with palm oil and pepper.

Professor Zweibeer is a very absent-minded man. He was busily engaged in solving some scientific problem. The servant hastily opened the door of his studio and announced a great family event: "A little stranger has arrived. "Eh?" "It is a little boy." "Little boy? Well, ask him what he wants."

YOUNG FOLKS.

"SAMBO."

BY NORA LAUGHER.

When I was about nine years old a friend presented me with a young retriever dog. He was a great, big fellow, with a short, black, curly coat and not a white hair upon him.

We named him Sambo and soon he and I grew to be great friends.

In those times I went to a day school in the village, where Sambo soon learned to carry my bag of books for me. Every morning he waited for me at the front door and would frisk around me until I placed my book bag upon the ground, when he would take it up in his mouth and walk soberly behind me until I reached the school.

Punctually at twelve o'clock would Sambo call for me every day and whatever books or work I had to take home he was ready to carry. Again in the afternoon at four o'clock he was always at the school house door to escort me home.

I had two little friends, named Laura and Jessie, who lived at the mill, a mile away from our house; but who frequently called for me on their way to school. When they were late Sambo would hasten across the fields to meet them and hurry them up to me so that we were all ready to walk to school together. He would carry their book bag for them until he reached me but always dropped it at my feet to take up mine and would not carry their's any farther unless I scolded him severely for being so ungallant.

Sambo was very fond of going with me to search for eggs. I was allowed to keep a few tame bantam fowls and had a nice little hen-house of my own. These fowls rejoiced in very high flown names. There was the Earl of Clarendon, Lady Paulet, Lady Raglan, Lady Teazle, Madame Rachel and Mrs. Borrowdale.

Madame Rachel was a cunning little grey hen, perfectly tame and fond of perching herself on a favorite high-backed chair in the dining-room during luncheon. She would not fly off her nest when I went to take an egg from under her. But one day, when Sambo happened to be with me, he ran on first and poked his big, black nose right into the nest, where the little hen was seated, having just laid an egg. Of course she flew off with a frightened cackle. My surprise was great to see Sambo take the small, warm egg in his mouth and bring it to me. He evidently had an idea that it was a stone, for he dropped it at my feet, of course breaking it.

"Naughty doggie," I said "ah! you must be careful."

Poor Sambo sat down and looked ruefully at the broken egg, as if ready to cry at the mischief he had done, and that was the first and last egg the dear, good dog ever broke.

Soon Madame Rachel and he were good friends and she would allow him to fetch the egg from underneath her as she sat upon the nest.

Intelligent as Sambo was, I could never make him understand that he must not take the eggs from under a hen when she was sitting. One time the poor fellow got into bad disgrace for carrying away, one at a time, the whole thirteen warm, brown eggs from under neath poor little Madame Rachel's wings, and laying them upon the dining room hearthrug.

Sambo was very partial to white cats; but had a great dislike, which in a few month's time amounted to positive hatred, for colored feline pets.

When he and I were out walking, if we met any white cat or kitten, Sambo would stop to tenderly lick her face, often getting a terrible scratch in the eye for his caress. However, he would never allow his superior strength to take advantage of a poor, weak cat; but would sit down and blink his poor, wounded eye, and looking knowingly out of the other one, would seem to moralize thus: "Well, it is certainly strange that pretty, white pussies will thus reverse the golden rule—I suppose it is because the poor little creatures don't know any better!"

Seeing that he was such an admirer of white cats, I determined to get him a white kitten for a playmate and accordingly begged one from a neighbor. A dear, little, soft, fluffy creature she was, and we named her Pearl.

Sambo grew very much attached to her and would carry her about in his mouth, or in the round basket which he had long been in the habit of carrying, and which pussy often chose for a resting place.

Unfortunately poor Pearl only lived two months, dying accidentally from rat poison.

Great was Sambo's grief; he howled pitifully when he could not find his little playmate.

We were quite horrified the day after we had buried her to see Sambo come trotting into the sitting room with the little, dead kitten in his mouth. He had found her grave, under the nut trees, at the end of the garden, and it was sad to see the poor doggie licking her face and trying to recall her back to life.

He seemed so lost without poor Pearl, that I, not being able to procure another white cat, begged a nice, dark tabby kitten. But I was unfortunate in my selection. Mr. Sambo put on a kind of sulky, proud air, and would not take the slightest notice of her. He seemed to say, in his expressive dog language, "I will have a white pussy to play with or nothing."

Some two weeks afterwards, when Sambo and I reached home from school, I found an important looking basket had just arrived by the Tysoe carrier, addressed in a bold hand to me.

By the mews proceeding from it I knew it contained a cat, and rather dreaded Sambo's reception of it.

I slowly opened the lid and out jumped a a large, white cat with pink eyes.

"Tysoe," I ejaculated, for that was the village, where I guessed the basket came from, and from that moment we learned to call the cat "Tysoe," which finally abreviated to "Tyce."

Sambo's reception of Tysoe was very good, for the poor cat being very much frightened at such a huge, black animal, crouched down upon the carpet and did not retaliate at his licks and caresses; but submitted to be tenderly lifted up in his great mouth and carried around the room.

Sambo and Tyce grew to be very firm friends. It was a funny sight to see us three out for a walk in the fields perhaps two miles from home. Myself leading the great, black dog by the ear, who would be carrying the white cat, either in his mouth or curled up asleep in the round basket, the handle of which he would hold steadily between his strong, white teeth for fear of awakening her.

Besides carrying my books to school, looking the eggs, and carrying the white cat around, Sambo would do a great many intelligent tricks. One I took great pains to teach him was to select the Stratford weekly paper from a heap of Toronto daily papers. I used to hide the paper I wished him to find amongst the pile of others, and he would slowly paw them over, one by one, with his right fore foot, until he came to the right paper, and then trot knowingly up to me with it in his mouth, always shaking hands after he had presented it to me.

Sambo was remarkably fond of shaking hands. Indeed, too much so.

Never shall I forget one day walking from the village where we resided to Stratford—a distance of five miles—with Sambo for protector. My friends there persuaded me to stay all night. Sambo was allowed to sleep upon the wool mat at my room door which was left open. In the night I awoke in a terrible fright to see two large, fiery eyes close to me in the darkness and to feel a hot breath upon my face and neck, and a heavy thump, thump, thump upon my arm.

"Sambo," I called, when fully awake. Then came another heavy thump, this time falling on my head. But I was no longer afraid, for I knew it was only my doggie wanting to shake hands. No doubt the faithful creature wished to see if his little mistress was quite safe, and to assure her that, being in a strange place, he was carefully watching over her.

The Toronto paper used to arrive by a carrier, and Sambo was soon taught to go every day to the corner of the road to meet the man and fetch the newspaper, and woe betide any person who attempted to molest him, when upon his daily errand.

When I was about thirteen years old I was sent away from home to a boarding school, near Montreal, where I remained for four years. Sad, indeed, was the parting between my dear old doggie and me. I am quite sure that I cried more at the idea of leaving Sambo than the thought of going so far away from home amongst strangers. The tears coursed down my cheeks when I read this extract, in the first letter I received from my sister: "Poor Sambo misses you dreadfully and wanders around the house and garden, carrying Tyce in his mouth, to look for you."

Superstition.

In all ages man has found phenomena he could not understand. In ancient times all minds were clouded by fear and superstition. Every unexplained fact had a divine significance. The more ignorant man was, the greater his demand for interpreters. The consummate knaves appreciated this, and the result was that the lower classes were duped and held in mental bondage. An eclipse might be a harbinger of death, or a clap of thunder the warning voice of the Almighty. Sickness was often understood as the action of evil spirits; unusual noises, were made to drive these malicious spirits from the body. In those days a soothsayer was the family physician. His knowledge and skill were directed to satisfying, or frightening away, supernatural things. Man then only lived in abject fear and slavery. Instead of gaining a mastery over himself he allowed everything superior and mysterious in nature to rule him. We can scarcely imagine his wretched state.

A brilliant lecturer has said: "Fear is the dungeon of the soul. Superstition is the dagger with which hypocrisy assassinates the soul." In this progressive age, superstition although much modified is not yet extinct. There are many simple-minded people to-day who consider an epidemic a divine visitation. We have often heard sorrowing mothers bravely say in the simplicity of ignorance: "The Lord giveth and the Lord taketh;" "It is the will of God." Do these misguided people know that Divine visitations always come to the ignorant and those who willfully disregard sanitary laws? Those people who allow filth and putrid matter to accumulate in streets and houses must prepare themselves for pestilence and the wrath of the supernatural. The mother who does not work in harmony with natural laws, must not speak of Divine punishment, if God does not preserve her offspring. Instead of following the ancient plan and allowing a knavish soothsayer to be our master, it is much better to call upon the immutable forces of nature. We should so utilize the elements, that instead of ruling they may become the servants of our wishes. The laws of nature are strange indeed. If we disregard them they become most destructive tyrants, but if we obey them, they become our servants.

Pleasant Hope.

Some men move through life as a band of music moves down the street, flinging out pleasure on every side, through the air to every one far and near that can listen. Some men fill the air with their presence and sweetness, as orchards in October days fill the air with the perfume of ripe fruit. Some women cling to their own houses like the honeysuckle over the door; yet, like it, sweeten all the region with the subtle fragrance of their goodness. They are trees of righteousness which are ever dropping precious fruit around them. There are lives that shine like star beams, or charm the heart like songs sung on a holy day. How great a bounty and a blessing it is to hold the royal gifts of the soul so that they shall be music to some, and fragrance to others, and life to all! It would be no unworthy thing to live for, to make the power which we have within us the breath of other men's joy; to scatter sunshine where only clouds and shadows reign; to fill the atmosphere where earth's weary toilers must stand with a brightness which they cannot create for themselves, and which they long for, enjoy and appreciate.

She Was Confident the Dream Would Come True.

He—"I think your mother is a very nice woman, Sadie."

She—"Thank you, John. She is a very nice woman; good-natured and kind-hearted, but she has her weakness, like everybody else. She is very superstitious. Why, she actually believes in dreams."

He—"Well, a great many people believe in dreams."

She—"Yes, so I have heard. But just fancy! She had a dream last night, and she is confident it will come true."

He—"What did she dream?"

She—"She dreamed that you gave me a gold watch and chain for a New Year's present."

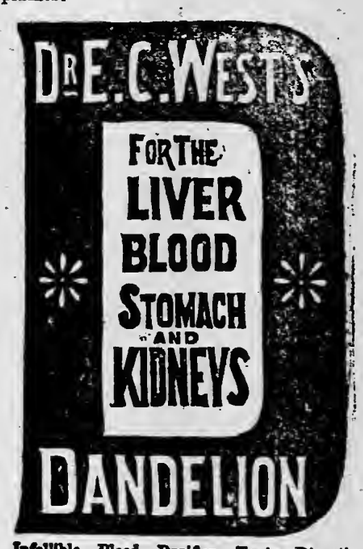
WELL SPOKEN OF.—I can recomend Hagyard's Yellow Oil very highly. It cured me of rheumatism in my finger when I could not bend them. Ida Plank, Strathroy, Ont. A medicine for internal and external use in all painful complaints.



BE PUNCTUAL.—A witty woman once said her husband had three hands, "right, left, and a little behind hand." She was very prompt and punctual in all her ways, and this fault in her generally kind husband was like a thorn in the flesh. A wise and thoughtful man is generally found prompt in his place at meal time. It is one of the most discouraging things in the world to a housewife who prides herself on her good cooking to have the head of the domestic circle and the chief object of all the nice, delectable things that are placed upon the table dilatory about taking his chair at meal time. Mothers should be very strict with their boys. The youngsters are so fond of play and it is such a trial to have the face and hands scrubbed that it is often a daily tussle to get them ready for the table. But persevere; the habit once formed and it is important enough to use the rod energetically, will be of life-long service to be the means of making his wife a happier woman. One woman gave her boy 25 cents for being punctual at meals three times a day for a week. If he failes he was fined. It worked like a charm.

$1.000 FORFEIT!

Sample bottles 25c. and 50c. Large bottles $1. Genuine wrapped only in blue. Sold by all druggists, or sent by express on receipt of price. JOHN C. WEST & CO., Toronto Ont.

—"I have been figuring," said Statistic, "on the amount of finger-nail that is wasted in this world every year, and, sir, it is something enormous the average person trims off a thirty-second of an inch of nail from each finger every week, or three inches a year. The average of human life the world over is 40 years. Look at that sir! Ten feet of finger-nail for each finger—a round 200 feet from the 20 fingers and toes. Well, sir, there are 1,500,000,000 people in the world, and altogether they waste, on an average, 300,000,000 feet, or 56,818,15 miles of finger-nail in a generation. Why, sir, that is sufficient to reach around the earth, and still leave nearly 10,000 miles to do our scratching with. And only think! it would take less than four generations to raise finger-nail enough to scratch the eyes out of the man in the moon. There is a heap of waste in this world, sir, a heap," said Mr. Statistic.

FAITHFUL.—J. R. Faithful, of Stroud, Ont says he suffered from quinsy for several years, until cured by Hagyard's Yellow Oil which medcine is a specific for all painful complaints.

MAYOR HOWLAND'S PLEA FOR THE CHILDREN OF TORONTO.—The Young Men's Prohibition Club of Toronto has undertaken a series of Sabbath afternoon mammoth gospel temperance meetings. At the opening meeting, when over 1,500 people were present Mayor Howland, who was greeted with prolonged applause, said: Let us rid ourselves of this horrible vice-producing death-dealing, miserable system. Take this saloon system. It is the centre of infidelity; the centre of blasphemy and corruption. Before one hundred years are over, people will look back and say we must have been barbarians to have tolerated it so long, There is no man or woman who has not at times felt his utter helplessness in seeing those who are nearest and dearest debauched, while he had no right to prevent it. Within the last year how many young men and women under twenty years of age do you think have been in the hands of the police in Toronto? One thousand! I tell you friends, it makes my blood boil when I think of the workingman's children. (Applause.) How those traps are put on the edge of the street to catch the workingman's boys. I tell you, I don't see how we stand it. I don't understond how we allow such things. Look at those great breweries! Look at the great buildings! Their size. Look at their strength! They are made to last. They are not built for to-day's trade. What are they waiting for? All their present stock of merchandise may be gone in a week; See the bright rosy children of Toronto dancing joyfully home from school! it is for them the breweries wait! They are waiting for our children. (Applause.) I hope there will be thousands brought here and sayed from that miserable ruin. Let us have a clean city; a city cleansed of one of its worst curses. I want to say I would rather see the light come into the face of some poor man, some poor sin-stained wreck, as he says with power. "I'm going to be a good man," than I would be Mayor of the city of Toronto (Prolonged applause)

THE Queen of Madagascar is too much of a barbarian to appreciate that ornament of our civilization, the saloon. She shut up, lately, every establishment of that sort in her kingdom. The proprietors, in their injured innocence, asked for compensation. "Compensate those you have wronged," said Her Majesty, "and I will pay the balance," upon which they departed in a very reflective state of mind.

"Reader," in informing you of the wonderful remedy for Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Bronchitis, Consumption, and all affections of the throat and lungs, we feel that we are doing you a great kindness, as if you have any of the above complaints, if you will only try it we will guarantee satisfaction in every case or money refunded. Ask for McGregor' Lung Compound. Price 50c. and $1.00 per bottle at R. L. Stephen's, Drug Store Markdale. 3

Now, is there nothing in your household to change? Is there nothing in your disposition to rectify? Is there nothing in your purposes to be different? Is it an aim that you have constantly before your mind to so carry yourself that every one in your presence shall go away feeling that for a time, at any rate, he has been made happy?—Beecher.

MANY a man of respectable intellectual powers has gone down to ruin, and died miserably, because of his limpness, which made it impossible for him to break new ground or to work at anything whatsoever, with the stimulus of hope only. He must be bolstered up by certainty, supported by the walls of his groove' else he can do nothing; and if he cannot get into his friendly groove, he lets himself drift into destruction.

I do not think that flowers knows how much the dews bless them; but the dews do bless them immeasurably. In heaven you will find how much good you have accomplished—and I pity the man who can estimate in this life all the good he has done. He must be living a starveling, poverty-stricten life. But blessed is the man the result of whose good deeds will be disclosed to him in the other life in greater measure than this! —Beecher.

HOUSEHOLD.

Economizing The Morning Hours.

A raw young housekeeper is frequently overwhelmed by domestic details, with which an older housekeeper of mature judgment and large experience can readily cope, accomplishing the same amount of work in one-half the time, and with less than half the trouble and friction. This does not arise merely from the fact that the older housekeeper has acquired greater mechanical skill and swiftness, but, what is still more important, she has acquired the habit of forethought and the faculty of organizing. She has learned to carefully and judiciously lay her plans and make her rules and arrangements, so dovetailing the various details of her household work that one task will not conflict with another. For instance, before the fire dies out in the stove, she will carefully reflect over everything that has to be cooked or heated before the next meal, whereas, the inexperienced young housekeeper will perhaps only remember after the morning fire is all out that she wanted an extra kettle of hot water, or she wanted to make a dish of blanc mange, or some other dessert for dinner, early enough to avoid interfering with the cook when the latter sets about getting dinner. I will take this occasion to advise all young housekeepers to make an especial point of keeping on hand a perpetual supply of hot water. (I am addressing myself, now to country housekeepers who have not a range supplying them with this article.) Make it a rule that your cook shall always have at least one kettle of hot water on the stove, and that she shall always replenish this immediately after pouring out its contents. It is so little trouble to do this, and it will incalculably facilitate your domestic routine. It is very disirable to keep two kettles, so you need never interfere with the kettle of hot water intended for making tea of coffee. If you will insist on always having a kettle of hot water on the stove, you will so often have a sudden and unexpected need for it that you will be glad you have established this rule. For instance, you will sometimes want to draw a hasty cup of tea for an ailing friend, or some sudden illness might arise in which every moment of time gained was an object, and then you might find a kettle of water already heated of invaluable service. I have known a housekeeper thrown back an hour by having to wait for hot water after the fire had died out, when, by a little forethought, and by making the rule I have above advised, she would not have had to wait a moment.

A housekeeper should, early in the morning, arrange all her plans for the day and let the cook know the programme. Let her think carefully over everything that needs to be done that day, and try to order and time the various details so that there shall be no hitch nor conflict about them. For instance, if coffee is to be roasted, the best time to have this done is immediately after the cook has taken up dinner. The stove is then nicely heated and just in the right condition for roasting coffee. By setting the cook to do it then, both time and fuel will be saved, and the task will probably be completed by the time you have dined and are ready to give the cook her dinner. This is also a good time for making yeast.

Kitchen Hints.

A great deal is thrown away, even by the poor, that in Europe assists to make good food. The skin and bones of fish, for example, put again into the liquid in which a fish has been boiled, simmered and strained off, will be as good to use as is much of that sold for gelatine. This may be used as a simple broth. It may be thickened with rice and flavored with onion and pepper; or, with the addition of a little flat fish and suitable spices, it will form a fair fish soup. Taken in any of the ways mentioned, it makes a nourishing meal, while, with a third of milk added, and warmed, it is a very comforting and restoting drink for an invalid. There is much virtue in despised fishbones.

A dish formerly despised, but which is beginning to be better known, is Toronto scrapple, a compound of fresh pork boiled to a jelly, seasoned, and thickened with prepared Indian-meal and wheat-flour. This food is considerod very healthful, and is bread and meat in one. It is usually fried a light brown, and may be eaten cold. It is excellent for men to carry who have to take their dinner to their work in fields or shops, and may be supplemented by apple-pie, or apples and gingerbread. To these hints we add a few "old-fashioned" recipes, which may be found interesting.

PIE CAKE.—One quart of sour milk, one teaspoonful salt, fresh butter (a lump size of an egg), stewed pumpkin, mashed very fine, one pint, four tablespoonfuls of molasses. Stir in flour—usually coarse, unbolted flour—until the batter is thick. Beat an hour to insure lightness (as no soda is used), finally mix stiff, roll out into a flat cake, and bake in the skillet, before the open fireplace, upon a bed of coals.

CRACKLING BREAD.—One quart sour milk, two eggs, a little lard, one quart cracklings taken from the freshly tried-out lard, and a little salt. Stir in meal until thick enough to pour into skillet, and bake quickly.

PUMPKIN BREAD.—One quart stewed pumpkin run through a fine sieve, one quart buttermilk, one teaspoonful salt, one cup New Orleans molasses, corn-meal enough to make a thick batter. Bake in a Dutch oven slowly all night. In the morning it will be baked thoroughly, and ready for breakfast.

A BIT OF THRIFT.—When apples are frozen, many housekeepers consider them good for nothing. When thawed, press out the juice of the soft and seemingly spoiled apple. For apple marmalade boil down a quantity of the frozen liquid and thicken with fresh apples, pared and quartered. Stir until thick and smooth, season with bruised cloves, allspice, and stick cinnamon. Marmalade made in this way is finer flavored than that made from sound apples.

A delicate, clear jelly is made from the juice of frozen apples and two-thirds the quantity of white sugar. Boil until it jellies then pour into glasses.

PUMPKIN MOLASSES.—In olden times, when cellars were scarce, and a wagon-load of pumpkins was carelessly left out in the cold (or unavoidably), the frugal wife with her assistants hunted out the big iron kettle, the copper one, and hung the large pot upon the crane. Many hands made short work of cutting and paring the pumpkins ready for the kettles. When boiled soft they were emptied into large tubs, the soft mass cooled and strained, the juice boiled until thick as molasses, when it was pronounced "pumpkin molasses," and fit for use. In early times, when eatables were costly, this was a great saving, and made an excellent substitute for New Orleans molasses, which was considered a luxury. Maple molasses was not much valued in those days; even pumpkin molasses was relished as a change from the maple syrup.

TO MAKE LEMON DUMPLINGS.—You must take half a pound of bread-crumbs grated, half a small cup of sugar, quater of a pound of chopped and sifted suet, the juice and grated rind of one large or two small lemons, a saltspoonful of salt, the yolk of one egg, and enough of milk to moisten the ingredients but not reduce them to a batter. A cupful is the usual quantity. Mix, and divide into six parts, and tie in six different small cloths which have been first dipped in boiling water. Tie lightly, leaving room for the dumpling to swell, and put into water which boils. Let the dumplings boil gently one hour and a half, then make a lemon sauce for them of a teaspoonful of flour, one tablespoonful of butter, half a cup of sugar, juice and grated rind of a lemon, and large cup of boiling water. Boil all up once, and serve hot in a sauce-boat, with dumplings.

MIXED TURNIP AND POTATO.—Turnips in any form are supposed to be the appropriate vegetable to serve with boiled mutton. To many, however, the turnip is somewhat indigestible, and by others its flavor is objected to. It is therefore necessary to mix it with other things to tone it down, and potato is the best for this purpose. Mash the boiled turnip, and also an equal quantity of boiled potatoes: mix thoroughly, season with salt and pepper, and for each portion of the mixture add a piece of butter of the size of a walnut, and milk enough to make it quite soft. Put it into a baking-tin, add a small piece of butter, and bake to a delicate brown. This mixture, combined with egg and bread crumbs, rolled into shapes, and then fried, is acceptable as croquettes.

Some More Prehistoric Houses.

Dr. Schliemann, accompanied by his wife, has left Athens for a voyage up the Nile as far as the second cataract. He hopes to be able to begin excavations in Crete in the spring, on his return from Egypt.

Originally he had intended resuming his work at Mykene, in the hope of discovering the palace of the Atreidæ. His calculation was that about one hundred laborers would be necessary, during three years, for removing the accumulated debris in the acropolis and in the lower town. However, the Greek Archæological Society resolved upon taking the matter in hand, and has been engaged on the work since June last. Owing to the small number of laborers employed (sixteen) the work has gone on slowly. No gold ornaments have been found except a gold wire in spirals. The surmise that a prehistoric building would come to light has been verified.

On this subject Dr. Schliemann writes to a friend: "A fortnight ago I was at Mykene, and I have convinced myself that on the summit of the rock the foundations of the prehistoric edifice have really been found. But they have afterward been altered and evidently used for a Doric structure—probably a temple. The prehistoric building seems to have been the old palace. Of the walls no trace is preserved. On the other hand, at the south side below the summit, one-half of a hall and a little room have been brought to light which seem to belong to the old palace—all the more so as in the hall itself one-half of a round hearth, exactly as in Troy and Tiryns, is preserved.

"Of the walls of this hall, and of the little room also, a portion still exists. The walls have the same style of building as those of the Tirynthian Palace; that is, they consist of a lower part of quarry stone and clay, and above of sun-bricks; and they are first covered with a thick layer of clay dressing, and then with a wall-dressing of lime. This palace has also been destroyed by fire; and the heat was so fierce that nothing has been preserved of the wall paintings in situ. In the rubbish, however, several pieces of painted wall plastel were found. I also found some such at Mykene in 1876."

No further excavations have been made on the slope of the castle rock. On the lower terrace, where the laborers were afterwards set to work—that is, to the right of Dr. Schliemann's former excavations—a small house with three little rooms was discovered. In the largest of these the fireplace is in the centre (as is always the case), and in good preservation. With the exception of some fragments of terra cotta vases and idols, no finds dating back to a prehistoric epoch have been made. A Doric capital was found, which seems to belong to the later building on the summit of the rock.

ETIQUETTE NOTES.

Say woman or lady, not "female," when speaking of a girl or woman.

Take off your overcoat and overshoes and leave them in the hall before entering a parlor.

In introductions gentlemen are presented to ladies; young men to older men; young women to older ones.

Do not tilt your chair, sit on it in an easy position, keeping your feet as quiet as possible, also your hands. Both may of course be moved quietly, but not so frequently as to attract notice. Above all, do not lounge or take ungainly attitudes. If you must do this, do it in your own room, where you will annoy no one.

The following are from a very sensible little manual written by a well known literary man, and entitled "Don't":

"Don't repeat the scandals and malicious rumors of the hour."

"Don't discuss equivocal people or broach topics of questionable propriety."

"Don't be witty at another's expense; don't ridicule anyone; don't infringe in any way the harmony of the company."

"Don't be longwinded. When you have a story to tell, do not go into every detail and branch off at every word—be direct, compact, clear, and get to the point as soon as possible."

"Don't cling to one subject; don't talk about matters that people generally are not interested in; don't, in short, be a bore."

"He who imagines he can do without the world deceives himself much; but he who fancies the world cannot do without him is under a far greater deception."

HEALTH.

Only an Apple Left.

One morning in the winter of 1878 a Christian lady, who had often distributed to the necessities of saints, sat alone in the room, where advanced age and the beginning of what proved to be her last illness confined her.

Roused from her meditation by the entrance of her daughter, she said: "My dear, old Mr. and Mrs. W. have been on my mind all night. I hear they were not at church on Sunday. I know that they are poor; they may be sick and in want. I wish you would take a basket, call a cab, drive to the market, buy a good supply of provisions, and take it to them." Here she gave the address, and as her daughter was leaving the room, she added, handing her a thick flannel skirt, "Perhaps you would do well to take this, too; the weather is cold and Mrs. W. may need it."

The younger lady went. The provisions were bought, and at the head of the third flight of stairs in the tenement house to which she had been directed, she stopped short. Through the thin door she could hear Mr. W.'s voice asking a blessing upon the food before him.

At the conclusion of the grace, and smiling at what she now believed to be her mother's unnecessary anxiety, she knocked and entered. Sure enough, there they were at dinner, the wife at the foot of the table, waiting to be helped, the husband at the head, carving—one large apple, all the food they had!

With tears in her eyes, the lady drew forth her kindly stores, and while a comfortable meal was being prepared, she listened to their thanks, and heard from uncomplaining lips their pitiful story—how they earned a precarious living as clear starchers; how the husband had been attacked by rheumatism, and the wife by a felon; how, though utterly destitute, they had poured out before their God all their troubles; and how they had surely believed that He would send some one to help them.

This excerpt presents all the usual accompaniments of society as it is usually found: 1. "A Christian lady" in her "last illness" benevolently inclined, and accustomed to look after the poor. 2. Sends her daughter to the "market to buy a good supply of provisions," and take it to the old and indigent couple. 3. "The husband has rheumatism, and the wife a felon."

These conditions are in the strictest harmony with what is expected, and does happen in all grades of society as it is now constituted. These improper foods, illnesses and deaths, are the result of a lack of a proper understanding of the laws of health. The superabundant carbonaceous substances in the shape of animal fats, sugary preparations, starch and fine flour, cake and bread supplies, all of which are devitalized by the cooking process, causes the blood to become thick and dark, clogging up the capillaries, superinducing inflammations and abnormal strictures. Our green-grocer supplies are only once elaborated in the process of growth and are consequently insufficiently vitalized to supply such human tissue as God has made ample provision for; and upon the basis of which He, by implication, promised our first parents an exemption from a physical death.

The proper human food supply is designated in Gen. 1:29, and consists of ripe uncooked fruits and grains. These should be eaten in very great moderation, and not oftener than twice a day.

Usually, if fruit is eaten, it is eaten after more than enough of other and much less valuable tissue-building food has been taken. Under such circumstances, it is impossible to have the processes of vitalization by steeping in the vital fluids, and oxydation by breathing imparted to the blood.

A proper understanding of God's laws leads irresistibly to the conclusion that ample provision has been made for the daily reparation of the used up tissues with as good material as was used the previous day. If this high standard of excellence is strictly maintained, it is clear that sickness, old age, dicrepitude and death can be avoided.

This is not immortality; but it is "incorruptibility," the contention for which the Saviour always contended.

This story of an aged lady, charitably disposed, with ample means, is ill with what proves to be her last illness, instructs her daughter to go the market, buy a supply of food and take it to an aged couple of whom she had been thinking during the night. On her arrival she found the husband suffering from rheumatism, and the old lady with a felon, the three cases of illness being the result of the use of such food as is usually used,—suggested the foregoing thoughts, which are held by the writer as a result of 30 years carefully devoted to the study of the human system and its legitimate requirements.

How to Take a Bath.

There is a right and a wrong way of taking a bath. The wrong way may result in evil, but the proper mode of bathing is sure to bring benefit. A separate bath-tub is not essential in taking a good sponging. For healthy persons, who are accustomed to a daily bath, cold water would be best on account of its invigorating influences. Those, who can take a bath only once a week, had better use warm or tepid water, as it cleanses the body more thoroughly. In using warm water caution should be taken, to avoid contracting colds. The best way is to sponge the body with cold water immediately after the warm has been applied; have a coarse crash towel at hand and rub the body thoroughly until a flush and glow appears all over the surface.

A warm bath should not be taken in a cold room. It is well to have the temperature of the water correspond somewhat with that of the room. If the bather has no tub, but merely uses the sponge and bowl, great care should be taken to avoid exposing much of one's person at a time. Beginning at the head, sponge but a portion of the body at a time; rub and dry the moistened part, and continue this plan until the bath completed. Especially do we advise this method, when the combined, warm and cold bath is taken. We would lay some stress on the advantage of using cold water. It is much superior as a guard against cold. Weakly or invalid people should be warned, however, against using cold water if their system is not vigorous or robust enough to witnstand its sudden influence. If it gives a shock to the system, the bather must desist at once. But if a pleasurable feeling is experienced and a glowing sensation follows, it is always the sign of a healthful and successful bath; no fear of taking cold need then be entertained.

Catarrh, Catarrhal Deafness and Hay Fever.

Sufferers are not generally aware that these diseases are contagious, or that they are due to the presence of living parasites in the lining membrane of the nose and eustachian tubes. Microscopic research, however, has proved this to be a fact, and the result is that a simple remedy has been formulated whereby catarrh, catarrhal deafness and hay fever are cured in from one to three simple applications made at home. A pamphlet explaining this new treatment is sent free on receipt of stamp by A. H. Dixon & Son, 308 King Street West, Toronto, Canada.

CHAPTER XX.—TO THE RESCUE.

We left Captain Morton, of the Nautilus yacht, in the honest and sympathizing society of Admiral Clifford. Between them had sprung up a friendly feeling, such as was more than likely to unite men of equal generosity of soul. A hidden community of feeling—of which they could hardly be said to be fully aware as yet—more firmly united them together; and as they listened to the guns from the Spray, which announced her entrance to port, each seemed to look at the other, as if he would say:

"These sounds are interesting in some way to both of us, because they will be interesting, certainly, to one."

But a great change was about to take place in the mode of proceeding of the two officers in their search for the daughter of Captain Morton—a change which no longer in any way necessitated that assistance which the admiral had suggested.

That change was brought about in this way: During the slight pause that ensued while they listened to the guns of the Spray in the offing, a miserably clad woman came up to the admiral and put into his hand a folded paper, which he at once without opening, returned to her, with a shilling on the top of it, as he said:

"My good woman, I dare say it is all here, and you are very badly off. But I am not able to give more, because I am forced to give so often."

"I do not want charity," she said.

"Then what is it?"

"Read that, sir."

The admiral opened the letter, and read the following words:

"If ever it should happen, while I am away on a cruise, that any inquiry is made about either of the children, it will be safer to make away with them, than allow any one to get them from you. I have, as you know, full confidence in you and although, of course, the girl is of very little consequence to me and my project, compared with the boy, still I will not have her go; and I would rather hear that she was dead, than that she had got away. Besides, she knows too much now and is clever far beyond her years, as you well know. Take her to the cave at once, on the least alarm, and do not let her stir till it is so completely over that there can be no danger. There is however, not much chance of any stir being made about her, since the American ship was never spoken of; and I believe that she was the only living soul saved from it. So now, Wagner, I beg of you to be very discreet indeed. I will take Gerald with me next cruise and that will be the last, as I hear the port admiral is on the lookout for the Rift. I sent this by Bowline, who will call at the cottage to see you about other matters."

"What is all this about?" said Admiral Clifford.

"You have read it?" said the woman.

"I have."

"Then read it to me, sir."

The admiral did so; and then the woman clapped her hands and said:

"That is it; I know now. That's what makes madam such a fine lady, that she can't so much as say, "sit down," to her poor sister. I thought as much!"

"What do you mean?"

"Why, that my sister, Mrs. Wagner, is carrying on affairs for Captain Dolan, to be sure, of the Rift, and that this letter, which I put in my pocket when she was not looking, is from him, and means that the little girl is to be murdered some day if anybody comes to look after her. I only asked her for a few pounds to take me to Gibraltar, where my husband is—he's a soldier; but she turned me out of her cottage, and I saw this letter, with just the corner of it peeping out of a closed door, so I dragged it out and brought it with me. And I know that Captain Dolan is a smuggler, and not a bit a fisherman."

"But what child—what little girl do you talk of?" said Captain Morton, with emotion.

"Oh! She told me about that long ago; it was saved from an American ship. She sha'n't turn her back on me for nothing. You had better, sir, as you are a great admiral, go and rout out Dolan; for I tell you he's a smuggler, and the Rift goes out smuggling—not fishing. And then there's an end to your airs and graces, Madam Wagner! Hoity-toity! indeed—not so much as 'you are welcome for a day or two, sister.'"

"Woman," cried Captain Morton, "you have said too much and too little."

"What do you mean, sir? You are hurting my arm."

"I do not mean to hurt you; but if you will answer me what I shall ask of you, I will give you the money you want to join your husband at Gibraltar."

"It's three pounds, sir."

"There are five. Now tell me where this Mrs. Wagner is to be found."

"In one of the cottages, sir, on the beach. In Dolan's cottage you will be sure to find her or Mrs. Green."

"Mrs. Green!—who is she?"

"Oh! very old, indeed. She minds the cottage while Mrs. Wagner is away."

"Away where?"

"That she never would tell me. But I know that she and Dolan and all the smugglers have got somewhere to go to that they can hide in, and where nobody can find them. I'll teach her to show me the door! Who's she, I wonder? Let a beggar on horseback! Oh! indeed!—and her fine carriages too, bobbing about? Hoity-toity! a great madam we are!"

"But the child—the girl!" cried Captain Morton; "what of her?"

"Well, sir, I don't know anything more of her but that she is with Mrs. Wagner."

"At the cottage?"

"To be sure."

"You saw her?"

"Well, no; she was not there, but that's where she was a year ago."

"You saw her, then?"

Captain Morton's voice was almost choked with emotion.

"To be sure."

"And she was—that is, was she very beautiful, with fair hair, inclined to auburn, and long lashes? She—she had a very sweet smile—so light, so gentle; and her eyes—something sad about the eyes, I think."

"Well, I think yes; and I saw the corals."

"The what?—the corals?—a necklace. Bracelets, jagged, natural corals that the child wore when the ship was wrecked. The snaps were rough Indian gold."

"Yes, I saw them, and a fan made of feathers, which was found in a box that came ashore after the wreck, Mrs. Wagner said."

Captain Morton leaned heavily upon the arm of the admiral as in accents of deep emotion he said:

"My child! my child! my own dear little one! At once, at once I will go. Ask for no help, for no assistance; for I feel that there is danger to my darling's life. I shall now seek her alone, admiral. This cottage, I will go to it at once; she may be there. I know the cottages on the beach; I will seek her there now, on the moment."

"Stay," said the admiral. "The cottages you speak of are not those you will have to seek. A boat will be your best conveyance to those in the occupation of the fisherman. I have heard of this man Dolan."

"Yes, my dear friend. God bless you for all your help and sympathy! A boat! I will go in a boat at once."

"Avast heaving, admiral!" said the sailor. "Here's Captain Grey and some of his quarter deck big guns, sir."

"Captain Gray? Oh! Captain the Honorable Minto Grey!" said the admiral, with a slightly perceptible smile. "We shall hear something now of the cruise of the Spray."

The noble captain of the Spray had landed, and was with a look of intense ennui, slowly approaching where stood Admiral Clifford and Captain Morton. The lieutenant of the Spray was close to his captain. When sufficiently near to do so with effect, the Hon. Minto Grey put up to his eye—where he at once fixed it by muscular contraction—a glass, and took a good look at the admiral.

"'Pon life," he said, "it's the old commodore."

"Yes, sir—the port admiral," said the lieutenant.

"What a providence!—seems no end of bother. Well, admiral that's over. Sunk the Rift."

"Sunk her?"

"Oh, yes! Rather a low affair, ah. To London, now as fast as post horses can take me."

"Sunk the Rift have you, Captain Grey?"

"Oh, yes. It's in the log."

"Oh!"

"Yes, ah. Quite a trouble, but it's in the log. Where's the log, Mr. Green—eh? The log."

"Here sir."

"Oh! Well let the admiral have the log. Haul down my flag on board the Spray. I'm off. Good-day, admiral—by-by! Ah, what a fatigue! That's over."

The Honorable Minto Grey strolled slowly away, leaving the lieutenant with the ships log-book in his hands, which he had taken from a sailor who had followed with it from the boat.

"The puppy!" said Admiral Clifford.

The lieutenant coughed.

"Oh, I beg your pardon, sir!"

The lieutenant bowed.

"I shall be happy to see you to dinner, sir, and then you can tell me more than captain Grey seems inclined to do of the Rift."

The lieutenant coughed again.

"You look, sir, as if there were some mystery in this affair. What is it?"

"The log-book, admiral, states that the Rift is sunk, under fire from the guns of the Spray."

"Well, sir, I suppose there can be no mistake about that?"

"I hope not, admiral; but if you will permit me to go on board the Spray again, and continue the cruise, I shall feel greatly indebted to you, sir."

The admiral bit his lip.

"Now, is not this too bad!" he said. "I ask for a vessel on a special mission and they give me one with such a commander as—as that—"

The admiral pointed to the retreating lounging figure of the Honorable Minto Grey who was making his way to the principal hotel as quickly as was consistent with the lazy habits he usually indulged in.

"Very well, sir," added the admiral. "Then go on board the Spray and take the command as from me. Do your duty, sir. It is not for me to do so serious a thing as question the logbook of Captain Grey; but go, you, sir, and do your duty."

The lieutenant bowed.

"I shall be glad to have a report from you, sir, whenever you please; and if you want any stores, you can have them, sir!"

"We want nothing, sir; and I have the honor to bid you good morning, sir!"

"Good morning! Captain Morton! Eh!—what?"

"Went off, admiral, in full sail," said the sailor servant. "Clapped on ever such a lot of extra canvass when he got to the corner, and went before the wind, sir."

"And that woman—where is she?"

"Nor'-nor'-west, sir. Tacked up Albion street, sir, and got somehow into port; for I didn't see no more of her."

"Well, well. No doubt we shall soon hear something more of Captain Morton. He seems a noble fellow."

"As true a seaman, admiral, as ever stepped between stem and stern. There, sir—there lies his little craft! the Nautilus, sir. Ain't she shapshape? Hilloa!"

There was evidently some movement on board the Nautilus. In another moment, as if some sea-bird had spread its wings, a streak of snow-white canvas fluttered aloft. Then a small boat might have been seen dancing over the water. Captain Morton was going on board his yacht.

At the same moment another boat was, at an angle from that one, making for the Spray, which had not dropped her anchor, but stood off and on in the roads.

Lieutenant Green was going to take his new command.

Bang! went a gun from the Nautilus; and the admiral accepted the salute as a "good-day to you, dear friend," from Captain Morton.

"Good fortune attend him!" he cried "He is a gallant fellow."

The stars and stripes, then, of the United States flag flew out from the Nautilus; and she went on her way, like a sea-bird, toward the cottages that had been indicated as those in which Dolan and Mrs. Wagner had their abode.

CHAPTER XXI.—THE PIRATES DIVIDE THEIR PLUNDER.

There is a heavy roll of sea up the English channel and against the chalky ramparts of old England the waves beat tumultuously, rushing back in foam and with sounds resembling the boom of artillery in the distance.

And into the cavernous recesses of the old cliffs, with a hissing vehemence, went the salt ooze, dashing into every crevice and bringing away chalk and flintstones to add to the debris at the bottom of the sea, while the extent of the cavernous recess was to that amount increased.

And against the covering of the sea-cave, where rode the Rift so securely, came the lashing tide, and a deep, misty gloom settled upon the face of the sea and the darkness was thick and palpable.

Within the sea-cave some strange scenes had taken place—scenes which it will be our duty to relate and which had occupied much of the time since last welooked upon Dolan on the deck of his vessel.

The smuggler and pirate felt that his authority was no longer of the character it had been among the lawless men he commanded and he had an appreciation of the necessity for conciliation.

It was, then, with such an idea that he called aloud to the crew of the Rift after the departure of Gerald from the vessel:

"Forward, all hands—forward! I have a something to say which may be for the good of all."

"You know my men," said Dolan, "that we have a prisoner on board the Rift."

"Aye, aye," was the cry. And a dark, scowling look came over the faces of some of them; for, contemporaneous with the thought of the possession of that prisoner, came the idea of the necessity of getting rid of him.

"You all know," added Dolan, "who that prisoner is."

"Aye, aye—the French captain!"

"Yes, the French captain. Now, my men, Captain Mocquet knows by this time a great deal about us."

"Death! death!" cried several.

"And Captain Mocquet is a rich man. There can be no doubt but that if we set a handsome value on his life he would pay it. Why should he not pay it?"

The crew were silent They did not fully comprehend the scope of Dolan's remarks.

"I mean," he added, "that if we let him go free we ought to be paid."

"Aye, aye," cried several.

"And as we are about to separate and give up this little confederation—as you are all about to leave me, each taking his share of the plunder and the profit of our cruises, why, such profit may as well be increased by a good round sum from the Frenchman. I propose, then, that he be offered his life for a hundred thousand francs."

"How much is that?" growled one.

"Five thousand pounds!"

Several of the crew whistled.

"Well, if you think it too much, we will say half that sum; but I am sure he is rich, and can pay whatever amount we want of him."

"And if he won't pay?" said Martin.

"Then I should say, for the general safety, hang him!"

"Belay there, mates!" said Martin, as there arose an angry growl from the crew. "The general safety won't be a bit better if he does pay the money; because then, you see, mates, he can go away at once."

"Oh, no!" said Dolan.

"Then, mayhap, captain, you will say what he is to pay the money for?"

"Aye, aye! Old Martin is right. What an out-and-out sea lawyer he is, to be sure!" said one.

"We can still keep him," said Dolan, "until we are dispersed; and anything he might say or do would be of no consequence to us."

"Mayhap, then," added Martin, "we can do that in any case; and then you see, mates, you wouldn't foul your hands and your souls with a useless murder?"

"You are a mutinous rascal!" cried Dolan. "My men, I call upon you to seize this fellow; he is a spy—he will betray you some day!"

No one stirred.

Old Martin looked as calm as possible, and then he said:

"Why, you see, mates, if I was what the captain says, and if I meant anything wrong to you all I should keep a smooth, civil tongue in my head; but you know, and he knows, that it is not true. All I have to say is that it's a sad and horrid thing to kill the Frenchman. You will say, some of you, he is only a Frenchman. I know that; but, poor man, that's his misfortune, not his fault."

"Good," said several of the crew.

"I propose, then," said Dolan, "that Captain Mocquet be offered life for fifty thousand francs—death, if he refuse! Who says ay to that?"

"Ay, ay!" cried several voices.

Then old Martin dipped his hands in the water and shook them over its surface.

"Look, you mates!" he said; "you know, some of you, what that means? It's a sailor's way of saying he washes his hands of that affair! Some of you have said ay to it; I say no?"

"Come on board, all of you," said Dolan. "It is one for all, now, and all for one. Let the boats drift."

One of the boats was made fast to a ring-bolt in the side of the cavern, and the rest were let float about, attached to it by the tow ropes, how they pleased.

"Bring him up," said Dolan. "Off with the main hatch!"

The order was obeyed; and then Dolan slowly crept away from the hatchway; for he knew not but that the first object that might meet his gaze would be the fair young face of that (as he believed) drowned girl, who had terrified him in the cabin; so that he would not have descended to it again for the whole sum he had just mentioned as Captain Mocquet's ransom.

"Ahoy!" cried Bowline down the hatchway. "Come up, you mounseer. Come up, will you? Ahoy!"

No one came.

"Very good," said Dolan; "go and fetch him."

"I are here!" said Captain Mocquet, looking pale and wan, as he appeared above the hatchway. "I are here. What for to go do you want of me?"

"Close the hatch," said Dolan.

The hatch was closed; and then Captain Mocquet uttered a kind of sigh of relief. His heart was in the cabin of the Rift, with his darling child.

"What want you at me?"

"Look you here, Captain Mocquet," said Dolan, "you are in our hands; you know now the secret of our cavern—at least, you will be able to guess it. You are dangerous to us; therefore—"

"Arretez. Monsieur Capitaine," said Mocquet, "I shall tell you. I, as one prisoner, was obliged here. I do not come (what you call him?) my own self, but unwillingly."

"That may be true enough, but it is the fortune of war."

"War? Non! Bah!"

"In a word, then, Captain Mocquet, we intend to hang you! Do you comprehend that?"

The French captain slightly bowed his head.

"I was to know," he said, "that to be one smuggler was to go by the custom-house—was to not pay what you call the duties—eh bien. That was little. I am for the trade free, on the shore of all nation, the goods of all nation, and the high bidders shall buy him. Bien! I care not for one smuggle. I place my hand on what you say one stomach—que dites-vous en Anglaise—no stomach? Stomach! ah, non—on my heart. I place my hand on my heart and I say to him, be tranquille—soyez tranquille—I say to him soyez tranquille, and smuggle! Bah!"

"But what's all that to us?" growled Bowline.

"I shall say to you what you call clear to the most mean and despicable capacity."

"Well, that's civil."

"Mais, as I say, I smuggle; but when I smuggle I do not cut de troat—coupez la—bah! bah! I will promise, parole d'honneur, I will not say of this place, or of anything; but I will go free, and I will have no more to deal with the Rfft."

"That won't do," said Dolan.

Captain Mocquet shrugged his shoulders and his hand shook as it rested on the hatchway. He knew he was—supposing a direct line could be drawn from him to her—about sixfeet from the heart of his Maria.

"Listen, n " added Dolan. "We intend to divide our gains and to disperse. Pay us—give us an order on some one in France and when we get the money for it—an order for fifty thousand francs—and I say when we get the money for it you will be free."

"Ah, you disperse—you smuggle no more—and the Rift—the cutter—the Rift?"

"That we shall take to some port and sell."

The countenance of the French captain brightened up, but his hand trembled still more as he said hurriedly:

"Bien, you sell him. I buy—I buy of you all the Rift. I give you fifty thousand francs for the Rift and for my life. I take him—I sail away wid him. I say bon soir, messieurs—I say no more. I buy him and give the order on the bank at Havre. I have spoke, mes amis. It shall be—eh? Eh?"

"That's fair!" cried Martin again.

"No," said Dolan. "I won't part with the Rift."

Mocquet's countenance fell.

"She's mine," added Dolan.

"Oh, no—no! Dieu merci! No—no!"

"Why, what's the matter with you now?" growled Bowline. "The rope is not round your neck yet, mounseer!"

"You will not sell to me the cutter?"

"No; I will not sell the cutter to any one," said Dolan, "at present. I will take another thought about that; and if I do sell her, it will be for more than you say. You offer nothing."

"Bien! nothing?"

"Nothing. The fifty thousand francs are for your life. You offer nothing for the cutter."

"Ah, I see. I shall give—what shall I give? I shall give fifty thousand more for the cutter."

"That's a good offer," said Bowline.

Dolan was silent.

"Hark you, captain," said Martin. "that's fair, and my mates right and left of me think it so. They fancy it will be a good round sum to divide among us along with what you have got to give us as well."

"Be it so," said Dolan, briefly.

A flush of color came to the face of Mocquet, and clutching the hatchway, he said:

"Then he is mine—mine, and no one dare—no one shall go! Hush! Bah! I shall say too much. I will buy him, then, one hundred thousand francs for life and the Rift?"

"Yes."

"I shall write one order; and I shall promise that one seal is on my lip—one seal."

"What does he mean?" said Bowline.

"He means that he will be secret," said Dolan.

"Oui—yes—secret. I will never—never say one word of the place, nor of the cruises of the Rift—never—never!"

"Lights closer here!" said Dolan.

Several flaming flambeaux were now brought close to the little group on the deck of the cutter, and Dolan, turning to Bowline, said:

"Go below; in my cabin you will find pens, and ink and paper."

"Ay, ay."

"I saw him!" shrieked Mocquet. "I saw him, sacre Dieu! I saw him myself!"

"Saw who?"

FRIENDSHIP.

BY JOHN IMRIE, TORONTO.

Friendship! thou holy bond that binds my heart
To others that to mine seem counterpart,—
Love-giving, yet love-getting all the more,
Thus daily adding to our mutual store
Of kindly deeds and words, each thought and look
As readable and clear as printed book;
Enjoyable in life's gay, golden hour,
Yet doubly so when clouds of trial lower;
Then closer draw, as lambs do in the fold,
To gather heat, and 'scape the rain and cold;
Till warmth and sunshine take the place of rain,
Then off to gambol on the hills again!
Oh! Friendship! thou art like a golden chain,
Each link a friend—each friend a golden gain!

A Curious Phenomenon.

The following account of a recent strange occurrence was published a few days ago in the Scientific American. The correctness of the statements are vouched for by Mr. Warner Cowgill, American Consul at Maracaibo, Venezuela. He says:—

"During the night of the 24th of October last, which was rainy and tempestuous, a family of nine persons, sleeping in a hut a few leagues from Maracaibo, were awakened by a loud humming noise and a vivid, dazzling light, which brilliantly illuminated the interior of the house.

The occupants, completely terror stricken, and believing, as they relate, that the end of the world had come, threw themselves on their knees and commenced to pray, but their devotions were almost immediately interrupted by violent vomitings, and extensive swellings commenced to appear in the upper part of their bodies, this being particularly noticeable about the face and lips.

It is to be noted that the brilliant light was not accompanied by a sensation of heat, although there was a smoky appearance and a peculiar smell.

The next morning the swellings had subsided, leaving upon the face and body large black blotches. No special pain was felt until the ninth day, when the skin peeled off, and these blotches were transformed into virulent raw sores.

The hair of the head fell off upon the side which happened to be underneath when the phenomenon occurred, the same side of the body being, in all nine cases, the more seriously injured.

The remarkable part of the occurrence is that the house was uninjured, all doors and windows being closed at the time.

No trace of lightning could afterward be observed in any part of the building, and all the sufferers unite in saying that there was no detonation, but only the loud humming already mentioned.

Another curious attendant circumstance is that the trees around the house showed no signs of injury, until the ninth day, when they suddenly withered, almost simultaneously with the development of the sores upon the bodies of the occupants of the house.

This is perhaps a mere coincidence, but it is remarkable that the same susceptibility to electrical effects, with the same lapse of time, should be observed in both animal and vegetable organisms.

I have visited the sufferers, who are now in one of the hospitals of this city; and although their appearance is truly horrible, yet it is hoped that in no case will the injuries prove fatal."

Minnie Lee.

BY J. R. WILKINSON.

I shall never see thee more, Minnie Lee,
Minnie Lee, with the gold brown hair;
And thy violet eyes, so sweet and pure,
And thy face so wondrous fair.
I've loved thee long, and well, Minnie Lee,
But the dream was all in vain;
And the busy years that drift away
Have left a weary ceaseless pain.

Do you remember a time, Minnie Lee,
When we wandered hand in hand
By a silver stream in the fair sunlight,
That wound through a summer land?
The world was glad and bright, Minnie Lee,
Mantled in wondrous bloom
Of beautiful waves of foliage and flowers,
And laden with rich perfume.

The emerald fields stretched far away,
In the mellow, rosy rays;
And the crown of the distant hills was lost
In a purple and golden haze.
The soft south wind toyed with thy hair,
And sighed among the flowers;
And wandering on o'er the billowy lea,
Was lost in woodland bowers.

Ah! sweetly, and gladly the song birds sung,
Aye, thrillingly glad and free;
And gazing enrapt on thee, I knew
That time was Heaven to me.
But the summer passed and changes came
O'er the face of the world so wide;
And an iron hand pressed cold on my heart,
And banished me from thy side.

I never shall see thee more, Minnie Lee,
And I'm tired and sad to-day;
And longing for rest and finding none,
As the years drift slowly away.
I bow my head and the tears fall fast,
And my soul is heavy with pain;
I can only see the gathering gloom,
My prayer was all in vain.

A Simple Story, Sweet and Sad.

BY GEORGE MURRAY.

Come, listen to my mournful strains,
A simple story, sweet and sad,
This tale of one who loved in vain,
Was told me by a harvest lad.

A gleaner brown, a rustic flower,
Loved a rich peasant's only son;
But she could bring no other dower
Than the fond heart that he had won.
She wept: The father said at last:
"Go, reap yon barley field of mine—
If, when three days from now have pass'd,
The task is done, my boy is thine."

The father spoke—The listening maid
With joy and love nigh swooned away;
Forthwith she seized a sickle blade,
And deftly plied it, night and day.
When, faint and wearied, in despair,
She felt her yearning strength depart,
She drew fresh courage from her prayer,
And prayer was prompted by her heart.

A daisy in her path delays
The tender glances of her eye;
"Price of my happiness," she says,
"Poor harmless darling thou must die!"
But while it perished in its youth,
It looked so beautifully mild,
That the fond maiden wept for ruth—
She, too, was but a blossom wild.

The third day passed—with twilight shade
The rich man to his barley came—
Breathless and pale, there stood the maid.
Her eyes triumphantly aflame!
"I did but jest, my girl," he cried.
"Ten crowns thy toil will amply pay,"
Alas! one more frail blossom died,
Cut to the heart, ere close of day!

Such is the story, sad and sweet,
I heard amid the golden grain;
The maidens sing it when they meet
And mingle weeping with the strain.

We are One in God.

A FRAGMENT.

God is a Spirit
Everywhere,
In Earth, in Air,
On Land, on Sea,
Where fixed stars be,
Or planets shine;
Wide as His own eternity,
He reigns whom saints adore,
Eternal God for evermore,
The Pure, the Holy, the Divine.

The Spheres, that in their course
Obedient to His will Roll on for-evermore;
The Mighty Laws of force,
That magnify His skill;
Each in their Treasure-store,
Hath God within; He reigns
Where harmony obtains.

The children of His grace,
Who joy to do His will;
Who, everywhere can trace
His handy-work and skill;
In Him, where'er they dwell,
Find fellowship complete,
In unison, their pulses swell,
Their Heavenly pulses beat.

WIRE FENCES.

Though the snow is not deep, neither has there been any severe drifting storms this winter, yet some of the roads are severely blocked with the beautiful. There are certain portions of the highway which is particularly liable to be blockaded with snow, and while it is as important to have a good road in winter season as in summer, we think now a good time for township councils to consider the advisability of giving encouragement to the erection of wire fences on leading roads. Some councils have done so in years past with good results, and we believe it is a judicious expenditure of public money. The amount of assistance given has been the providing of the wire by the council, and the duty of the road commissioners to see that it was properly used. There is, we believe, many farmers who would erect wire fences along their farms on roads, or portions of the road, where bad drafts are an annual occurence, and thus surmount the great difficulty. The various township councils will meet next Monday, and we would urge upon them the importance and desirability of giving this question their early attention.

Since the above was in type there has been a regular old fashioned storm blocking up many roads.

THE QUEEN'S HEALTH.

The news that Queen Victoria's health is failing will be heard with sorrow by her subjects in every part of her vast empire. It is not too much to say that the British people entertain for their Queen a strong personal affection. The generation that has grown up since she ascended the throne have never heard anything but good of her. She has not only been a wise ruler performing her state duties with remarkable prudence and fidelity, but she has taken the deepest interest in the welfare of all classes of her subjects no matter how remote their homes may have been from the seat of government. Nothing that pertains to the well-being of her people has escaped her notice. She has rejoiced with them when they were happy and has mourned with them when afflicted, It is not surprising, then, that this large-hearted sympathy has met with a ready and warm response, and that the British people everywhere feel a been personal interest in all that concerns her who in all sincerity they call their "beloved Queen." This is why the news that she is "breaking up very rapidly" is received with sadness that is both profound and general. Most people when they hear it, and are convinced of its truth, will feel as if they had heard of the serious illness of a much loved relative.

THE "MAIL'S" INDEPENDELCE

The Toronto Mail's declaration of indeyendence is an important event in the history of journalism in Canada. It has, until very lately, been the most party of party journals. It has been devoted to the interests of Sir John Macdonald and the party which he leads. so much so was this the case that when the Mail pursued a course diametrically opposed to the interests of the Premier and the Conservatives not only in Ontario, but all the provinces, a large party of the public could not be brought to believe that it was not playing some deep game for the purpose of strengthening the Conservative party and keeping it in power; and it is not surprising even now to see strong opposition journals affecting to believe that the Mail's independence is only assumed and that in spite of its strong declaration it is still a party organ. Is not this carrying incredulity and distrust a little too far? To our mind the evidence that the Mail has broken loose from the ties of party is so strong that none but those who are blinded by party prejudice can doubt its conclusiveness It has of late been working and working hard to weaken the Conservative party, and the platform which it now publishes is the very reverse of Conservative. In fact it is Radical in the extreme, so Radical that before it can be carried out a fundamental change must be made in the construction of the Dominion. The agitation which the Mail has inargurated for the abolition of separate schools will not only rouse the opposition of all who desire that the constitution of the Dominion be maintained in its integrity but will, if it succeeds in gaining many advocates, provoke a religious contest which will extend from one end of the country to the other- The Mail in its new departure is much nearer to the Liberal party than it is to the Conservative.--- [Montreal Daily Star.

The New York Society for the Suppression of Vice has determined to proceed against the publishers of the trash story papers and cheap libraries for juvenile reading on the ground that such publications have an immoral influence, and should be excluded from the mails. The good effect of the society's action is already shown by the fact that without a case coming to trial as yet some of the publishers are beginning to revise their more objectionable manuscript.

Flesherton.

From our own correspondent.

Hard frosts.
Good sleighing.
Business brisk.
Prices for grain improving at Flesherton.

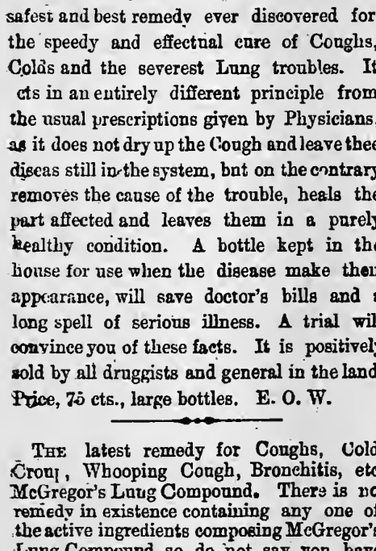
Monday last was fair day, but not as many cattle on the market as usual; a few heads changed hands with local buyers being Messrs. Petch, Good, McMullen, Wright, Cook and Purdy; these with outside men make this an interesting market.

Steps are being taken by the Presbyterian congregation here for the erection of commodious sheds on the grounds at the church; this is much needed and will supply a felt want.

W. Henrick, Esq., who has been in the employ of M. Richardson & Co. for some time bid adiew to our town Tuesday last, with a view of taking a position in a Wholesale Dry Goods House in Toronto. Master Henrick carries with him the kindest wishes of his numerous friends here, we wish him success in his new field.

New School at Flesherton Station Miss Hopkins the late popular junior teacher of the Flesherton P. S. has secured the position of principal of the Station School; probably this explains why she refused the offers and solicitations of our Trustees for re-engagement. We congratulate the Trustees of the new section on securing such an efficient and popular teacher. As we understand Miss Hopkins, extension of Certificate expires in July, we doubt not but by that time she will fully qualify for further useful work in her profession.

The alarm of fire being sounded from the Methodist Parsonage here on Friday morning last, for a few minutes there was a general stampede; the whole fire brigade about a score of men strong were on the run, arriving at the scene it was found only a bad chimney flame pretty well subdued by the Parson himself, but not before he had his fingers well frost bitten.



Mr. Wm. Rutledge's dwelling narrowly escaped being destroyed by fire on Sabbath Morning last while Mr. Rutledge was at church, Mrs. Rutldege at home ill, confined to her bed; some neighbors discovered the fire hastening to the scene removed the patient in her bed and soon succeeded in conquering the flames not however till some considerable damage had been done to the dwelling.

WHAT TRUE MERIT WILL DO.

The unprecedented sale of Boschee's German Syrup within a few years, has astonished the world. It is without doubt the safest and best remedy ever discovered for the speedy and effectual cure of Coughs, Colds and the severest Lung troubles. It acts in an entirely different principle from the usual prescriptions given by Physicians, as it does not dry up the Cough and leave thee discas still in the system, but on the contrary removes the cause of the trouble, heals the part affected and leaves them in a purely healthy condition. A bottle kept in the house for use when the disease make their appearance, will save doctor's bills and a long spell of serious illness. A trial will convince you of these facts. It is positively sold by all druggists and general in the land. Price, 75 cts., large bottles. E. O. W.

THE latest remedy for Coughs, Cold Croup, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis, etc: McGregor's Lung Compound. There is no remedy in existence containing any one of the active ingredients composing McGregor's Lung Compound, so do not say you have taken everything until you have tried this for your cold or cough, and your opinion will be the same as all who have used it, viz., that it is the best. Sold in 50c. and $1,00 bottles by R. L. Stephen, Druggists, Markdale. 1

West's World's Wonder, or Family Liniment, a never failing cure for rheumatism neuralgia, cuts, burns, bruises, wounds and frost bites. 25 and 50c. All druggists.

RUTH ELLIOTT;

OR,

A PROPHECY FULFILLED.

A TALE OF SOCIAL LIFE IN CANADA.

BY W. E. BESSEY, M. D.

PART III.—(CONTINUED.)

Discouraged and heart-broken with trouble and grief she returned home, and that night began to gather together a few articles of clothing, that she thought would be required; and hurriedly packing a valise, she retired after having given a few hasty instructions to her servants, and telling them she was about going on a journey for a few days. She retired early to get, if possible, some rest before starting on the early morning train; for she had resolved to seek her brother's interference on behalf of her worthless husband, if possible to secure his release. Such is woman's love. She could endure the misery of a drunken husband, but she could not bear the mortification and humiliation of the thought, that her husband, the father of her child, should be branded as a common felon; and the only hope she saw to save him was to enlist her brother Percy's co-operation. She did not intend to be long away if her efforts were successful, but if not she would much rather never see Montreal again.

With such feelings as these she arose early, after a sleepless night, and taking a light breakfast and wrapping baby carefully in travelling attire, she started for the station, accompanied by a maidservant, who carried her valise, all the while wondering what freak this was her mistress, always so sensible and nice, had taken. Always thoughtful for her mistress' and baby's welfare, she had fixed up a nice lunch, which she stowed away in a basket with a nice bottle of fresh milk, and seeing her mistress on the 7.30 train she wended her weary steps back to the house, wondering in her heart what new trouble this could be, or whether, in desperation, she had finally concluded to escape from her misery by deserting her home, and her miserable husband. Of course she was not yet aware that he had been arrested.

It was a cold, stormy night when Ruth reached Toronto; and being weary, she sought shelter in a quiet looking hotel near the station, where she was directed by the kind-hearted watchman, whose stentorian voice has waked the echoes in the vaulted roof of the Union Station for so many years.

"By George," he mused to himself, that's the most beautiful face I ever saw, be she flesh, or spirit, or both, it's all the same; she's a beauty and no mistake. It's too bad to see her in such trouble, poor lady; she looks as if she was after loosing every friend she ever had in the world. Perhaps she's lost her money; I guess that's it. Well, an' faith, if that's so, I'll be true to my country's good name, for I'm not an Irish gintleman if I don't go over to old Stubbs who keeps the 'St. James' and volunteer to pay for the night's lodging for herself and her baby; she hadn't much luggage, naythor; only a valise. Sure that thing don't look just right; there's something wrong. Maybe she's been turned out of house and home by some drunken blackguard or another."

And so off started No. X to make things smooth for the distressed lady.

"Faix, Mr. Stubbs, and I sent you a very dacent lady in distress over from the station. She arrived by No. 4 from the East. Now treat her well, and if she hasn't any money to pay with call on me. Now, d'ye mind. Don't distress her any more, poor thing, she's lost a friend or home, or maybe she's only a little gone in the head. Heaven knows, but whatever happens her I hope she'll not fall into the hands of the ghouls of the city and lose her character."

At the thought of the possibility he turned back to say to the landlord that if she seemed impecunious he had better let him know at once, and he would make it his business to acquaint the charitable ladies of the city of the case, so that she might be assisted if necessary.

All this was going on in the mind and heart of the old watchman, whose quick eye had taken a true measure of the lady in distress; and who, timidly strange, in a strange city, was all too innocent and two intent upon the errand she had come about, to be in any danger of running in harm's way. All honour, all the same, to the good Irish heart of the watchman; may he always be as true to his own kindly instincts, and as faithful in his duty to the stranger and wanderer, and some day he'll hear a Voice shouting "All-aboard for heaven," and, as the angel chariot pulls up at its destination, "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these ye have done it unto me."

The landlord's heart was touched. He spoke to his wife. She spoke kindly to Ruth, interested herself in her, had a nice cup of tea made for her and something nice got for her to eat; fresh milk also for baby, making an excuse of her interest in babies to relieve the poor, weary mother of her charge and attend to its wants, getting it to feed well and to drink heartily of warm milk.

Supper over she showed her to a cosy, warm room, and bade her try and rest, as she feared unless she got a good night's rest she would be sick; her cheeks looked so hollow and sunken, her eyes so suffused and red with tears and fretting.

All night long her sobs and sighings could be heard in the adjoining room, as she tossed and turned, and reflected upon the position of affairs with herself and her unfortunate husband.

Next morning, after paying her bill (for she was not yet penniless, although she had but little money with her), which was liberally discounted by the generous landlord, she set out to find her brother, leaving her sweet little babe in the care of her new found friend, the landlady.

She searched the City Directory in vain for his address; she had forgotten to ask for it, or indeed hardly dared to, lest her intention and destination should be suspected; she wished neither.

All she knew was, that he was engaged in a branch house of a large Montreal firm.

All day long she searched through the business portion of the city and visited every branch of a Montreal house that she was directed to without result. At last weary and disheartened she turned her face homeward to the hotel and baby, and was hurrying along rapidly, when in passing along Front Street a name caught her eye, "Percy Elliott, agent for Messrs. Lyman, Kerry and Evans, Montreal, Dealers in Drugs, Chemicals, Dye-stuffs, Druggists, Sundries, Surgical Instruments, &c."

An exclamation of delight escaped her, which attracted the attention of the man at the door. "Is Mr. Elliott in?" she said. "No," was the reply, "he's gone home more than an hour ago."

"Gone home," she sighed, with a groan.

"Yes, and he lives more than three miles from here," said the man, 'way out on Davenport Road."

"Davenport Road?" she repeated, "and where is that, may I ask?"

"Oh, I perceive you're a stranger here. Well, ma'am, it's a long way out, and it's snowing too hard now; it's too stormy for you to find it to-night. You take Yonge Street cars and then you get off and follow the road into the country. There are many fine houses along that road, and I can't direct you, but if you make inquiries you'll find it. He'll not be here till Monday now, to-morrow, Saturday, is Christmas, you know, and I'm shutting up to go home now till Monday. We won't be open till then."

"Oh, I must see him at once, to-night. I must see him," she said, as the snow blew in her face, almost blinding her. "God help me," she said, as her heart sank at the prospect of delay; if her errand was to be of any use it must be done quickly; it would not brook delay.

Wild grew the tempest, as it howled among the tall warehouses, and it was growing dark early. She pushed on, but lost her way and went several blocks too far; fiually, through the kindness of a city watchman, who accompanied her to within sight of the hotel, she got back and sank exhausted on the lounge in her bedroom.

"Did you find him?" enquired the kind hearted landlady, as she entered.

"Find him, no; but I heard of him and he's a long way out of the city. Oh, I must see him to-night. I must see him to-night," she exclaimed.

The landlady, now thoroughly interested in her, tried to soothe and comfort her, and encouraged her by saying that after she had got some warm supper she might go out and she would care for baby.

With a few cups of good warm tea her heart seemed to gain strength and with it new resolve. She would undertake the journey, she didn't know the house, but she would take the street cars, and she could enquire. But here a new difficulty arose. He lived with some friend; he was not married, had no house of his own. What was the name of the people with whom he lived? She could only hope by enquiries to succeed.

Wrapped in a heavy winter shawl kindly lent her, off she started, and taking the first car at the corner, forgot to ask where it went to until, on Sherbourne Street, well up, she asked where Yonge Street was, and was told she must alight and walk across to it; So Carlton Street led her to Yonge, and there, bewildered by the crowd of faces, not one of which she recognized, she, after making enquiries for Davenport Road, started on foot, no car as usual being in sight. On, on she sped through the blinding snow. Finally she reached the little chapel; this was Davenport road. And then for the experiment of finding a man in a multitude without any direction.

There was no time to lose; the storm continued with unabated vigor; the snow was blinding if one faced it; it was dismal, but her's was a heroic spirit; for love's sweet sake, and because she pitied and forgive one who had grievously wronged her, she would persevere. If God's own Son could expose himself to the miseries and infelicities of this sad, sinful world to save sinners, why shouldn't she, although she were an angel from heaven in purity, do her endeavour to save the man she had sworn to love from the ignominy and disgrace he had recklessly brought upon himself and all who bore his name.

As she hurried along, despite the blinding snow, remembering the directions of the woman of the inn that the road was a winding one and no gentlemen's residences existed along the first half mile or so, she felt that either the weather was growing colder or she was losing strength.

Would baby be all right with the woman at the inn. What would Percy say when she found him. Would he, could he, refuse to help her. No, surely not. Percy had always loved her, and through all the happy days of childhood and youth, as they grew up together, had he not called her his dear little "golden hair" until, growing tired of it, she had insisted on being called by her proper name, "Ruth;" and then Percy did not know anything, or, at least, very little of her sad experience; it had been kept from him at her own urgent request.

Ah! she thought, here they are, at last, those wealthy residences. She entered the first open gate; she rang the bell. A colored servant answered the door.

"Does Percy Elliott live here?" she asked.

"No mam, dere's no sich name on dis street, as I knows on."

She turned away sorrowful. A bad beginning, she thought. And then she prayed that kind heaven might guide her footsteps to the door of her brother's habitation. And God's ever watchful angels carried that message to the skies. On she sped to another, and still another, and another, with like result. Oh! it was pitiful, to see that lonely woman, out in that blinding storm, seeking for succor at the risk of her life for a wretch who had cursed her very existence.

Again she rings the door-bell of an isolated residence and beautiful grounds; and this time an old servant woman, answering the door, was at once interested in the weary-looking stranger, and besought her to come in out of the storm. She would enter the porch only. Well, thought the old servant, I have heard that name often, "Percy Elliott," why, that gentleman was here only last night, and I think he lives in a large house up the road about half a mile; there is a white picket fence in front of the grounds, evergreen trees stretch their branches over the walk; it is a large, cheerful looking house, with a large porch. You will know it by an immense drooping elm tree that stands nearly opposite; and it is called by some 'The Elm,' although the gentleman who owns the grounds calls it 'Pleasant Cottage,' or Chateau-gay."

Thanking the kind old servant, she hastily renewed her journey, this time inspired by renewed hope and energy. But she was growing chilly, and felt her strength would give way if she did not succeed soon. The storm continued with unabated severity. She reaches the elm tree, and the white picket fence. She entered the gate. Ah! how nice—just like Percy to choose such a place for a home. Her petition had been heard in that bright region where there is no night and storms never come, and a swift winged messenger had been sent to guide her to the very spot.

The place was all ablaze with light. She hesitated; she shrank from her task. She was all out of breath. She was all agitated. She must calm herself before she should enter. She leaned against a clump of evergreen trees beside the walk, and brushing the snow from the seat by its foot, sank down upon it.

"Oh, God, that I knew where I should find him! What if he is not here!"

That moan saved her life for the sound of a human voice, disturbed the spaniel dog which, bounding out from the porch, began to bark furiously at something down the walk, of which he appeared to be afraid.

Fearing that there must be some unusual cause for the dog's action, as he rushed back and forth between the porch and the cluster of evergreen trees down the walk, Major Dawson and Percy Elliott, who was enjoying a quiet game of chess, while the family were preparing Christmas trees, decorating the rest of the house, and preparing other pleasing surprises for the morrow, rushed out, and following the dog down the walk, came to the shivering shrinking form of a female, wrapped loosely in a winter shawl, and crouching half hidden behind the trees, with the bench at the foot. As Percy, who was in advance, approached, the woman looked up, and with chattering teeth, and with tremulous voice said.

"Can you tell me where Per—Percy—Elliott—lives."

"Yes, I'm Percy Elliott, what do you want him for?"

"Oh, Perch, don't you know me, Percy?" she said, as she made an effort to rise, "I'm almost perished hunting you in the storm, and cold. Oh, Percy, I've come to ask you to help me to—" and she choked for utterance, as she hung upon his breast; and he, in dumb amazement, stood like one who had lost his senses.

At last he found utterance, and exclaimed.

"Who are you, what brings you here, and so cold and wet? Why, what can this mean? Tell me, what do you want me to help you to do? For God's sake explain."

"Don't you know me, Percy? I want you to to hold me up, I am so tired and weak. I have been looking for you all the day long and all the evening until now. Oh (shuddering), Percy, I am so cold. Hold me up; I feel like fainting."

"Come into the house out of this storm and wind. Come, let me help you." He tried to move her, but her head fell back and sank like one lifeless at his feet.

"She faints!"

Her cheeks are cold, and the last leaden sleep
Hangs heavy on her lips.

Major Dawson, who stood by all the while, offered his assistance to carry her into the house, where they laid her on a couch. She lay there, pale, cold, and unconscious, like one that death was just about to claim for his own. But good, kind-hearted Mrs. Dawson rallied her daughters to her assistance; and by dint of hard rubbing, ammonia to nostrils, hot bottles to the feet, etc., etc., in a short time she was restored to consciousness, and looked around in strange bewilderment. Seeing Percy near, she held out her jewelled hand, on which she wore her mother's ring, to him, saying Percy, "Don't you know me, now, I'm Ruth!" and burst into a flow of tears, which brought tears to the eyes of all present.

Percy now recognized her, and exclaimed:

"Why, yes, it is Ruth, my sister, what, in heaven's name, has brought her here?"

At Mrs. Dawson's suggestion a cup of hot tea was drank gradually: and she was carried and put in a warm bath, the cold, wet clothes replaced with dry warm things, furnished by one of the young ladies. Percy was as much amazed and dumb-founded as if one long dead had arisen, but was forbidden to trouble her just then with questions, and kept still.

In a little while, with the warm bottles of hot water, etc., etc., natural heat seemed to return, and exhausted nature sank into a deep sleep.

Still Percy watched by her side, and after sleeping about forty-five minutes, she became restless; and muttering, called for her child, which woke her. Percy asked her if she recognized him, and if she felt better.

"Oh, yes, Percy. I'll be all right again. The way was so long, and it was so cold and stormy. I was only exhausted. I'll soon be all right now. I am not sick. But, my child," she exclaimed so earnestly as to startle Percy, "my poor baby, where is my baby," and recovering her thoughts again she said, "Oh, my baby, Percy." I must go back to the hotel to my baby. Let me get up. Do, Percy, please. I must go back to baby."

"What hotel is baby at?" he asked. "I will go and bring it. You cannot leave here to-night."

"At the St. James, near the station," she replied, "and my valise is with it."

He hastily drew on his great-coat and leaving his sister to the tender care of Mrs. Dawson and her daughters, accompanied by the Major, who volunteered to go with him, they sallied forth. It was a wild night. The wind howled fiercely from the north; the snow which kept falling fast was driven in all directions by the wind. They made their way down the road to Yonge street and succeeded in catching the last car. How Percy shuddered at the thought of his poor sister being exposed on such a night. He could not divine the cause; it was a mystery to him yet.

They arrived at the hotel and enquiring for a baby left by a lady who had been seeking him, Percy Elliott, the anxious hotel people were much relieved to hear that she had found him out after all. They had tried in vain to dissuade her from attempting it on such a night, but she was desperate, and then they trembled lest she might have lost her way, and perished from cold and exposure.

The good landlady wrapped baby carefully up. Percy took it in his arms, Major Dawson carried the valise, and calling a sleigh, they were not long in reaching home with their precious burden. Mrs. Dawson took charge of baby. If an angel had arrived in that household it could not have received a warmer welcome than did that little one. The whole household vied with each other in attention to both child and mother.

Next day was Christmas. All Percy's engagements were cancelled, and the Dawson's, out of sympathy, spent a quiet day at home. Percy spent all day listening to his sister's story of grief and suffering. He was touched by her pleadings in favor of the man who had so cruelly wronged her. It was a woman's love—so tender, so forgiving. She had exposed her life to the wildest of storms, and a long and anxious journey, to ask his aid in behalf of her worthless husband. He must yield; he could not refuse her; but he was careful to let her know that it was for her sake and not his.

"For my dear baby's sake, then," she said; he nodded assent.

"And now," said he, "as soon as you are able we will start.

Meantime when Mrs. Blackstone was missed from home, all sorts of wild rumors were set afloat as to the cause of her flight and whither. No one knew, so secret had she kept her intention.

Arthur Blackstone had plenty of time to get sober in his criminal cell. Whiskey is not a part of prison rations; but he grew quite nervous and restless; this was heightened by the absence of any news from his wife. He expected she would have frantically flown to the prison to see him and to seek his release. He was more puzzled than any one; his conscience condemned him; he grew more wretched daily. The gaol doctor was applied to for something to quiet his nerves and give sleep. A sleeping draught was ordered—morphia, chloral, and bromide of potassium, in full doses. Blackstone saw, as he thought, lots of company that night in his cell. More than he wished to see. Big devils and little ones, baboons, monkeys, snakes, lizards and many-headed monsters appeared before him; and amid the gloom he thought he saw a skeleton pointing its finger at him, and with its fiery eye balls glowing at him, shout, "Yes, you are the man, you did it, you brought me here: and so you're here at last, are you? All right, now here's for it, let's see which can torment the other most." And then she would scream at the top of her voice until all pandemonium seemed to ring with the sound, "Yes, you did it, 'twas you."

His attendants failed to quiet him with the dose of medicine ordered, and growing desperate he seized the bottle and drank it off. The bottle contained several doses. He soon sank into a heavy stentorous sleep, which seemed to grow more profound until the attendants, becoming alarmed, the doctor was summoned.

Seeing that it was a case of narcotism, he used every means to arouse the patient from his stupor and to counteract the effect of the drug he had taken. It was no use, the breathing became slower and deeper, the pulse grew weak, flickered, life trembled in the balance.

"No constitution; prostrated from drink," exclaimed the doctors, for by this time more had been summoned. The pulse grew fainter, the breathing weaker and slower, until about four in the morning it ceased altogether. And he was gone—dead! the brilliant student; the fascinating lawyer; the dissipated husband; the forger against his wife—gone, dead! in a felon's cell!—no friend or companion near—Oh! the desolation of that hour.

Next morning the obituary notice in the paper read: "Died, on Christmas night, in a felon's cell, ARTHUR BLACKSTONE, the once brilliant lawyer. Young men, take warning. A promising youth died in a drunkard's and felon's cell. This is drink's doings. God bless the Scott Act or any other act that would keep men sober."

The day after Christmas, being Saturday, Percy Elliott arranged for apartments on the Pullman for himself and sister to Montreal. Reaching there on Sunday morning, they were shocked to find crape on the door of the Blackstone mansion; the blinds down, and the whole place wearing a funereal look. Oh, 'tis a ruse against something, they thought; but on entering and enquiring what was the matter, imagine their surprise on being told that Arthur Blackstone, whom they had come to secure the release of from prison, had already been released by death, the work of his own hand, accidentally swallowing an over dose of medicine.

This was a new grief for poor Ruth, but her tears refused to flow, her eyes were as dry as the hearth stone in front of the grate there.

"Poor fellow," she exclaimed, "if he had only known what I was doing for him I would have been satisfied," she said. "He will now think he was deserted by all, even by me. Oh, my God, my burden is greater than I can bear. Lord help me to cherish his good deeds, forgetting the evil, and so fulfil the law of kindness."

The funeral took place next day. All present seemed struck with dumbness, gloom being over all the scene.

Were we not in a reflective mood, and a believer in Providence, we might not have indulged in such thoughts as "What a happy deliverance," "What a special providence," "How strangely evils work their own cure, sometimes."

It was a gloomy Christmas at the Elliott mansion, and yet it had ended in a feeling of intense relief. No one conjectured where Ruth had fled to or what had been the object of her sudden journey; but it had terminated better than they had dared to hope, and she had brought back Percy with her. Blackstone was buried, and, let us hope, all the sorrows of which he was the author, with him. Let us hope, also, that his disastrous career, and unhappy end, may have a lesson in it for those who think they can succeed in life, with ability or brilliant talents, without good moral habits.

As for Ruth, some sympathized, some blamed, but those who knew her best, admired her heroism and self sacrificing devotion to a worthless man. As for her mother she had prayed and waited for the deliverance which had come at last. And now Cowper's beautiful hymn on Providence haunted her like an inspiration, and she wondered why she had never before seen so much beauty in it, and so she kept singing over and over again:

"God moves in a mysterious way
His wonders to perform,
He plants His footsteps on the sea,
And rides upon the storm.

"Deep in unfathomable mines
Of never failing skill
He treasures up His bright designs
And works His sovereign will.

"Ye fearful saints fresh courage take;
The clouds you so much dread
Are big with mercy and will break
In blessings on your head.

"Judge not the Lord by feeble sense,
But trust Him for His grace;
Behind a frowning providence
He hides a smiling face.

"His purposes will ripen fast,
Unfolding every hour,
The bud may have a bitter taste
But sweet will be the flower."

Ruth, too, seemed to have changed greatly in a short time. She had grown more self-reliant and hopeful; and her strength and health seemed to be returning. When she did allow herself to reflect upon the sad career of her late unfortunate husband, she had but one regret, she bemoaned the action of her friends that had thrown him into a felon's cell for her protection—rather all had gone than that should have occurred.

"I should have thanked God," she would sometimes say, "had his good name been restored before he died. I did all I could, but I was too late and but for a merciful providence would have perished in the attempt. Had he but known I was working for his freedom I should be better satisfied." Thus mourned a faithful wife for a dissolute husband and father.

How to Succeed.

A correspondent, who appears to be in earnest, writes: "As a new year has begun, I thought an article from your pen on 'How to Succeed' might prove of interest to those who, like myself, are always ready and anxious to learn, and who desire to commence 1887 with a laudable ambition to succeed, if success is within their power.' This is rather a strange request, as we are not aware that we possess any special qualifications for imparting information on this subject to our inquirer which he does not possess himself. We do not believe the good old way can be improved on; at least, if it can, we are not acquainted with the method.

We well remember the supreme contempt with which we regarded the teachings of some of the wisest philosophers who ever lived, when first reading their advice to those entering the race of life, who aspired to succeed, or occupy an honorable position. How commonplace seemed their arguments and recommendations? To be assured that to reach the goal, integrity, sobriety, persistence, attention to business, regard for truth and honor, a settled determination to make the word as good as the bond, were indispensable, seemed so ridiculous, so frivolous, so out of character with the end sought for, which we had expected to secure by a patented or pyrotechnic method, that we threw them down in disgust; and we have no doubt that thousands of others have had a similar youthful experience, and labored under a similar delusion. But the old, old story has been repeated, as it will be repeated to the end of time. The then esteemed dreary platitudes have materialized into the wisdom of the sage, and proven that the possession and exercise of these virtues are as essential, nay, more essential now, to achieve a lasting success than they were a century ago, because fraud and tinseled shams were not then as rampant, as dangerous, as positive or as deceptive factors in the make-up of society as they are to-day.

Napoleon's definition of genius—success—explains its significance when coupled with his well-known aphorism: "Providence generally favors the heaviest battalions.' The student who carries off the honors at Oxford or McGill more frequently owes his triumph to laborious, unflagging study than a special so-called natural gift, exemplifying the fact that there is no royal road to learning. When the Prince of Wales' sons entered the British navy, the instructions given to the officer under whom they were placed, in effect were: "Teach them their duty, and show no favoritism," thus practically recognizing that although born with silver spoons in their mouths, they had to learn by actual experience, equally with the humblest seaman, how to splice a rope or box the compass. And thus it is in the ordinary walks of life. Not more senseless was King Canute's command to the ocean than is the too prevalent expectation that a special freak of fortune will bridge the chasm between ignorance and knowledge, and afford a loop-hole for a genius (?) to prove his superiority over sublunary mortals.

History repeats itself, and he is a wise man who cannot learn by the experience of others. As the lighthouse warns the mariner of the hidden rock or dangerous shoal, so the failures of the past should act as beacons to those who are anxious to avoid the pit holes which constantly beset their pathway.

Many of the failures are the result of misdirected effort. There is an old though trite saying, "You cannot make a whistle out of a pig's tail," so a man who has mistaken his calling cannot expect to successfully compete with a rival peculiarly adapted by taste and training for it. Others trust to chance in preference to following the beaten path. A few years ago we inquired of one of the most prominent of Colorado's miners, what, in his opinion, had been the ratio of successful to non-successful mining adventurers, during fifteen years. The reply was that one in ten thousand would be a liberal computation. Is it not rational to suppose that if these nine thousand nine hundred and ninety-nine failures had turned their attention to legitimate business the result would have been far different? Some fail because too little attention is paid to details, others because they simply skim the surface and fail to use the subsoil plough.

Life is a continual struggle from the cradle to the grave, and the man who is not prepared to meet with and overcame obstacles has no right to expect success. No cross, no crown. While it is certain that everyone who starts in pursuit of wealth or fame will not become a Croesus, a Bacon, or a Webster, it is equally certain that those who follow the divine injunction "Whatever thy hand findeth to do, do it with all thy might," and are guided by honor and principle, may rationally expect a certain meed of success to attend their efforts.

A Discussion of Gender.

"Why do you call a vessel she?" said Henry to Fred, the other day.

"Perhaps because she wears a bow in front," answers Fred.

"That might be one reason, but another is that she is not ready for business until she is properly manned."

"Yes; and it takes a good many yards to rig her out."

"Then I hear old sailors speak about her going in stays."

"Conclusive! But you must admit a ship is not always feminine."

"Well?"

YOUNG FOLKS.

How Helen Made Courtesies.

Charlie came home from school late.

"What is the reason?" asked mamma.

"Oh, I got kept in. I thought I'd run out of the room, instead of walking, and the teacher caught me at it, and told me to come back. It was just fun, though; I don't care."

Mamma had a little talk about disobedience to teachers, till Charlie finally asked, "Don't you ever do any naughty things in school just for fun, mamma?"

Mamma had to tell the truth, and say "Yes," and in a few moments she was telling the following story of herself to Charlie and some other little folks.

"When I was seven years old, I went to school to an excellent teacher.

"She had a way of having us all, when we were in line before beginning to recite, 'make a courtesy,'—'make a curchy,' we called it,—and another when we were all done, before going to our seats.

"The way we did was to bend our knees and drop a little, then straighten up again.

"Some of us had a trick of making another just before we sat down in our seats, and one day, soon after school began for the afternoon, as we were going to our seats, four of us 'made a courtesy,' and raised a laugh from those sitting near.

"The teacher told us to come up and stand before the desk, and after asking us if we liked to make courtesies, and being told yes, she ordered us to begin, and kept on till we were tired. When we were tired enough to tell her we were sorry, we could stop and go to our seats.

"So we four little girls began to bob up and down, up and down, like a jumping-Jack or a churn-dasher.

"Of course the scholars all laughed, and we laughed too, and thought it was just fun; better than studying in our seats.

"But after a few minutes our knees began to get very tired, and it did not seem so funny to us. Then one girl, and another, and finally the third, said they were tired and sorry, and went to their seats, and I stood there and bobbed up and down alone. I was very obstinate"——

"What was that, mamma?"

"Oh, I didn't like to give up, and say I was sorry.

"I would right off," said little May, but Charlie said,—

"O mamma, I know just how that feels inside! It kind of chokes you!"

"Well, I was very tired, indeed, but when Miss Dodge, who has since told me that I got so pale she feared I would faint, asked me, as she did several times, 'are you not tired, Helen?' I would answer, 'not so very,' and keep on squatting and rising in the most ridiculous manner.

"But all the time I was thinking, 'Oh dear, how awful tired I am! I wish I could just sit down in my seat and study,—what fun it would be! I wonder if recess never will come! I am so tired I just believe I shall die, and if I do, I guess my mother will scold Miss Dodge for making me make curchys all the afternoon!"

"It wasn't her fault," said little May.

"Of course it wasn't, but then I didn't see that it was my own naughty will that kept me there bobbing up and down for the whole school to laugh at.

"At last recess-time came, and while the scholars were all out, Miss Dodge said, 'Helen, I think you are tired enough to go to your seat and rest; don't you think you are?'

"'Yes, ma'am,' I said, quite meekly though I did not say I was sorry, as I ought; but I went to my seat and was not at all anxious to go out and play with the rest of the scholars; but I never 'made a courtesy' in school again when it was not the proper time to do so.

"Is that all? Oh dear, that's a good story; I wish it was longer. How I do wish I had been there to see you, but I wasn't born then, was I?" said Charlie.

"No," answered mamma.

"Seems to me you had all your good times before I was born, when you was a little girl and had such fun. I wish you had waited for me. But tell some more. You was naughty again, I think."

"Yes, but I can't tell you now;" so the children ran to the porch and practised "making courtesies"

Double Boys.

I do not mean twin boys, two little brothers so nearly alike that friends can hardly tell them apart, but two very different boys in one little body. You never heard of such a thing and do not see how that can be.

Let me see. If I were to take a handful of almond nuts and sit down to crack them, with you all standing about me, by-and-by you would see two little kernels lying in one nut-shell. When I was a little girl I used to call such nuts philopenas. Do you?

Well, just as those two little kernels lie snugly together in one nut, which looks exactly the same as other nuts on the outside, so do two little spirits lie inside of your little bodies, making you double boys.

Now if you look at some of the philopena nuts you will see that the two kernels are pressed and crowded out of shape; one will often be much larger than the other, but neither will be of the smooth, oval shape that belongs to almond nuts. This is because they are crowded two in one shell that was meant to be the house for but one nut. The shell is only just large enough for one, and if there are two, you see they must push and press and crowd each other.

So each little boy was meant for one dear little boy, and if two boys try to live in it, don't you see they crowd and press each other so that neither is of a right and perfect shape?

Shall I tell you of some of these double boys among you? Here is Harry. He has a very sunny, happy boy living in him with such a cross fretful double. Some days the happy boy looks out through his eyes, talks in his voice, and sings in his laugh; then whatever mamma asks him to do or says he may not do, there rings out the pleasantest "All right." I think that is the happy boy's name. Other days nothing is all right, but lessons, work, brothers, playmates, play, even dear mamma herself, are all wrong. That is because Master Fret is the biggest and strongest boy on those days and happy All Right is crowded close against the wall and the sunshine is all squeezed out of him.

Frank has two boys also. One is a loud boy that stamps and shouts, bangs and slams in the house as well as out of doors. His mate is a quiet little gentleman who remembers that too much noise disturbs the busy or sick or nervous people in the house.

One of Robbie's boys is deaf and doesn't hear well when he is called to lessons or bidden to do some work or when Papa says, No. The other of that double boy answers so quickly, pleasantly, and politely when he is spoken to that everybody likes to have him around,

In Ned's body lives the laziest fellow, who growls out, "I can't," "Too much trouble," "I don't feel like it;" then he yawns and stretches and says, "I'm so tired." Along with him lives an active, cheerful fellow who plays with all his might and main, and sometimes when it is study time sets at lessons with a will and is such a nice scholar.

Now is it not a pity to have two such different boys in one little body? Would it not be ever so much nicer to have only one, and that the better one, growing into the fairest and most perfect shape? I am sure you think it would, so I am going to tell you that each of you can help the boy you like best to grow so fast as to crowd the bad ugly fellow into such close quarters that he will shrink up and grow smaller and smaller till there is almost nothing left of him

Don't you know sometimes you'll find in an almond shell a good, fair, whole nut and one tiny, little shrivelled up speck that hasn't had any chance to grow into a philopena? Now the nut-shell hasn't any power to control what is inside of it. God makes to grow in it what he likes, one or two kernels; but God has made you different and leaves it to you to help the inside boy to grow. By thinking and taking a little care you can hush that loud boy's voice and step so they will not annoy others and make you seem rude; you can cure that boy's deafness so he will hear every time he's spoken to. The lazy boy will wake up and stir himself if he is only managed right; and the merry, happy boy can just swallow Master Fret if he is only given half a chance.

Is it hard? Well, yes, of course! But hard things are what make men of boys, and you all want to be men, you know, just as soon as ever you can.

SCIENCE.

A Russian engineer reports that he has discovered a process of reducing petroleum to a form of crystals which may be easily and safely transported to any distance and then reconverted into liquid form.

The oxide of iron is one of the most adhesive cements for iron. With this a join can be made so perfect that the iron will break before the cement will part. It is mixed with sulphur and sal-ammoniac moistened with water.

The diminished cost of production in metal work was illustrated recently by Dr. John Percy, in an address to the British Iron and Steel Institute, by the statement that a gross of steel pens, formerly costing $35, might now be produced for eight cents. The cost of making gold chains has been reduced to an eighth of what it was.

A series of experiments at a Russian military hospital, upon soldiers suffering only from slight injuries, yielded results which indicate that the habit of smoking has a tendency to retard digestion. The smoker required seven hours to digest a meal made up of the same kind and quantity of food which was digested in six hours by those who did not smoke.

Probably few persons realize how unreliable are the unprofessional thermometric reports which are telegraphed in Winter over the country after each cold wave, so untrustworthy are even the best of spirit thermometers in unskilled hands. Dr. John Rae expresses the opinion that the thermometer which is quoted as having recorded 58 degrees below zero in Manitoba is from 13 to 15 degrees in error. An instrument for the accurate measurement of low temperatures is needed as much as a reliable pyrometer for testing the temperature of molten metals.

The ratio of sickness rises and falls regularly with the death-rate in all countries, as shown by Dr. Farr and Mr. Edmonds at the London Congress of 1860, when the following rule was established: Of 1000 persons, aged thirty, it is probable ten will die in the year, in which case there will be twenty of that age sick throughout the year, and ten invalids. Of 1000 persons, aged seventy-five, it is probable 100 will die in the year, in which case the sick and invalids of that age will be 300 throughout the year. For every 100 deaths, let there be hospital beds for 200 sick, and infirmaries for 100 invalids.

One would almost imagine that the power of the microscope had reached its limits; but it is now claimed that, by the discovery of a new kind of glass, that power will be increased to an incredible degree. The new ingredients in the improved glass are phosphorus and boron, and the difference between the new and the old glass is found in the refraction of light. With the old glass the full power of the microscope was the discernment of one five-hundred-thousandth part of an inch, and with the new glass it is claimed that the one two-hundred-and-four-million-seven-hundred-thousandth part of an inch can be distinguished.

There is more in a heap of coal than most persons are aware of. Besides gas, a ton of gas coal will yield 1,500 pounds of coke, 20 gallons of ammonia water, and 140 pounds of coal tar. Destructive distillation of the coal tar gives 69·6 pounds of pitch, 17 pounds of creosote, 14 pounds of heavy oils, 9·5 pounds of naphtha yellow, 6·3 pounds of naphthaline, 4·75 pounds of naphthol, 2·25 pounds of alizarine, 2·4 pounds of solvent naphtha, 1·5 pounds of phenol, 1·2 pounds of aurine, 1·1 pounds of aniline, 0·77 pound of toludine, 0.46 pound of anthracine, and 0·9 pound of toluene. From the last named substance is obtained the new product known as saccharine, which is said to be 230 times as sweet as the best cane sugar.

Of Course.

"If you had a note to pay to-day," he said as he sat in an insurance office looking straight at the agent, "and you had all the money but $5, would you ask a friend to lend it to you, or would you let your note go to protest and ruin your credit?"

"Let the note go to protest, of course!" was the prompt reply.

Then the clock ticked and ticked, and the noise of a hair falling to the floor sounded like a crow-bar, and the man with the note said he guessed it was going to snow, and the entrance of a couple of visitors mercifully permitted him to escape.

A pulp boiler weighing thirteen tons, twenty-three feet long, seven feet in diameter, and which it required eight horses to draw to the depot, has just been turned out by a firm at Sherbrooke, Quebec.

Medicine Hat has the name of being the most peaceable town in the Territories. No rows, in which whiskey takes a part, occur there. In the towns surrounding people are continually hanled up charged with violating the liquor laws; but here the laws are not violated.

A Campbellford lady, well known for her kindly disposition and her earnestness in working in any good cause, was much surprised a day or two ago on being addressed by name and having a sum of money placed in her hand, with the request to apply the money to charitable purposes.

A farmer at Dundee, Que., recently undertook to take home, without payment of the $5 of duty to which it was liable, some furniture which he had purchased at Fort Covington, but he was intercepted by a Customs officer and it cost him to settle about nine times as much as he paid for the furniture.

The Court of Queen's Bench of Manitoba has declined, on the ground of having no jurisdiction, to issue a mandamus compelling County Judge Prudhomme to pronounce on the re-count upon all ballots cast in the North Dufferin election. At the re-count the judge declined to consider any but rejected ballots.

A young man by the name of W. J. Butters was killed in a saw mill in the Tp. of St. Vincent, on Friday of last week, by the bursting of a pulley which he was turning—a piece striking him on the forehead between the eyes. He lived but two hours after the occurrence. Deceased was 33 years of age, and leaves a wife and four children.

One day last week the people of Victoria, B.C., were treated to the novel spectacle of an imposing Chinese fueneral, which was conducted with all the barbaric pomp possible. The hearse was preceded by gong-beaters, men on horseback carrying flags and banners, and curiously-attired figures. Immediately following the hearse was a black horse, saddled and bridled, supposed to be for the use of the spirit of the deceased celestial. A line of carriages filled with chattering Chinese brought up the rear.

On Thursday of last week Mrs. Stephen Van Worden was found dead in the woods at Port Saxon, N. S., about two miles from the main road. The circumstances are reported as follows:—Since the death of her husband the deceased had resided with her son, Mr. Abram Van Worden, at Port Saxon, and at the time had been paying a visit to her daughter, Mrs. William Chisholm, at Clyde River, some three or four miles away. Having stayed beyond the limit arranged for, Mrs. Van Worden had sent one of her children to inquire if the grandmother was all right and still at Mrs. Chisholm's. It was then ascertained she had left for home two days before. A search was immediately instituted, with the result stated. The deceased was a native of Aberdeenshire, Scotland, and was more than eighty years old.

During the past year 77,221 cases of lobsters were packed on P.E. Island, valued at about $405,410. The number of fish killed amounts to over 25,946,256, averaging in size about seven to a can. The greater portion of these goods were shipped to England. Besides these some 14,703 cases, put up in Newfoundland, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, were brought there for shipment. On the whole the season has not been satisfactory, and in all probability the packers will soon hold another convention to consider their course for the future. Compared with last year the output has been about 1,430 cases more, but the fish have decreased again in size; for whereas in 1885 it took six and a half lobsters to fill a can, during the past year it took seven. In fact, ever since 1879, when it took but three to a can, the fish have steadily decreased in size, sometime by three-fourths of a fish to a can per year.

How Iron Bends.

Hundreds of existing railway bridges whose carrying trains a day with perfect safety would break down quickly under twenty trains per hour. This fact was forced on my attention nearly twenty years ago, by the fracture of a number of iron girders of ordinary strength, under a five-minute train service. Similarly, when in New York last year, I noticed, in the case of some hundreds of girders on the elevated railway, that the alternate thrust and pull on the central diagonals from trains passing every two or three minutes had developed weaknesses which necessitated the bars being replaced by stronger ones after very short service. Somewhat the same thing had to be done recently with a bridge over the river Trent, but the train service being small, the life of the bars was measured by years instead of months. If ships were always among great waves, the number going to the bottom would be largely increased. It appears natural enough to every one that a piece, even of the toughest wire, should be quickly broken if bent backward and forward to a sharp angle; but perhaps only to locomotive and marine engineers does it appear equally natural that the same result would follow in time if the bending were so small as to be quite imperceptible to the eye. A locomotive crank-axle bends but one-eighty-fourth inch, and a straight driving-axle a still smaller amount, under the heaviest bending stresses to which they are subject, and yet their life is limited. During the year 1883 one iron axle in fifty broke in running, and one in fifteen was renewed in consequence of defects. Taking iron and steel axles together, the number then in use on the railways of the United Kingdom was 14,848, and of these 911 required renewal during the year. Similarly, during the past three years no less than 228 ocean steamers were disabled by broken shafts, the average safe life of which is said to be about three or four years. Experience has proven that a very moderate stress, alternately from tension to compression, if repeated about 100,000,000 times, will cause fracture as surely as a bending to an angle repeated only ten times.

Calvin's Influence Still Lives There.

The small republic of Geneva spends annually one-fourth of its income for public instruction; this policy is not modern, but it has existed since the Reformation, when it was taught by Calvin that knowledge is the strength of a nation. Calvin himself created the college which bears his name, and installed in it the same building which is still used for the same purpose and called St. Antoine; it is the Geneva boys' pride to finish their studies in that establishment. The first degree of instruction is given to children from three to six years old in 56 schools, divided among the whole canton and counting over 3,000 scholars. The primary instruction is gratuitous and obligatory from 6 to 13 years old. At the end of each academic year (beginning of summer) examinations take place, after which prizes, consisting of books and silver medals, are delivered to the best scholars. This distribution of prizes is followed by a fete given to all the children of the different schools in the town. After meeting all in one of the public gardens they are led in procession through the principal streets, with bands and escorted by soldiers, to large shady grounds where games of all kinds are prepared for them. When playing is over they receive cakes, wines and fruit, and later in the evening a magnificent exhibition of fireworks closes the day, which is talked about during all the holidays.

Connubial Sarcasm.

Husband—"Bell, your feet suggest a capital paraphrase to me of those two lines contained in Goldsmith's 'Village Schoolmaster:'

And still they gazed, and still their wonder grew,
That one small head could carry all he knew."

Wife (sweetly, expecting a compliment)—"How so, my pet?"

"Thusly, (edging toward "the hole the car-penter left):"

And still I gazed, and still my wonder grew
That big '9' hoofs could wear a small '3' shoe."

The piece of bric-a-brac that she grabbed from the mantel did not hit him, but it cracked a panel in the closing door as he vanished.

Woman in the Home.

A woman's life should be written in her home, her past with its warmth of sunlight, its shadows of memory, her present with its strength of service, its grace of sympathy, and her future with its calmness of coming twilight, its restfulness of hope beyond the night. No woman's life has full, visible expression without a home. Homeless women are denied their natural language, and speak with conscious effort, with sense of loss, a language less vital and human, like deaf mutes by sign and gesture. But emotion is more than utterance, life more than utterance, life more than its utmost expression. We may miss the rightful insignia of our home, but we cannot be disinherited. Those whose spirits are at home in the truth, the faith, the love which are immortal, have built for themselves, not tabernacles on the Mount of Transfiguration, but eternal homes.

A Remarkably Sharp Witness.

Sam Johnsing, having attended a night school for a few weeks, believes that he is the smartest nigger in Austin. He was a witness in a burglary case, and created a sensation by his intelligence.

"Do you think you would recognize the burglar if you were to see him again?"

"Why, boss, of course I would."

"You are sure you would identify the thief if you were to see him again?"

"I tell you so ag'in. I'se not one of dese fool niggers what doesn't know nuffin.' I could 'dentify dat man eben if I nebber seed him ag'in. I don't hab ter see him ag'in to 'dentify him."

No Light in the Window.

As the train sped along in the night, with drowsy passengers outstretched upon the seats, the conductor was observed frequently peering out of the frosty window into the darkness. The night was black, and nothing could be seen but a sheet of snow over the shadowy landscape, and yet the conductor shaded his eyes with his two hands and held his face—a weary looking face it was, too—close to the window-pane.

"Looking to see if your girl is awake yet?" inquired an inquisitive passenger, with a coarse laugh.

Winter Spearing.

Spearing through the ice in winter affords considerable sport at a time when other methods are stopped by the severe cold. It may be practiced with comparative comfort, and on the hundreds of small lakes to the north of us, with certainty of success. To begin then construct a small shanty of common siding, about five feet square, and with a small door for entrance. It should be made without other opening and without crevices, which would admit the light. This is floored having a hole a little larger than a flour barrel. If so inclined you may provide a luxury in the shape of a small stove of sheet iron with stove pipe of about two inches in diameter. Being now ready for operations, convey the shanty out upon a frozen lake or river where the water beneath is from five to fifteen feet deep. Cut a hole through the ice to correspond with the hole in the floor of your shanty. Place the latter over this hole. If light enters between the bottom of the shanty and the ice, block up with snow. If the lake is covered with snow scrape off a space around the shanty to admit daylight into the water.

On entering this shanty the eye can distinguish nothing, in the almost total darkness, but the glaring hole and bright water beneath. In a few moments the outlines of bjects are distinguishable, and on looking downward into the water, the weeds and bottom appear with almost startling clearness. No matter how cold without, or how wildly blows the wind, your may here take your comfort as thoroughtly as in you own snug home.

Having provided a wooden minnow, loaded at the bottom with lead, gaudily spotted with red and blue and having a bright tin fin on each side and a tin tail, fasten it by a line from three to six feet long (depending on the depth of the water) to a stick about eight inches in length. This is held in the left hand, the minnow is dropped into the water, and by bending the fins and tail a little, it is made to "rove" over a circuit of several feet by a slight continuous jerking of the little stick. A little practice will enable the novice to "get the hang of it," and a day or two will make him an adept. The minnow is thus made to dart hither and thither across the hole, and three feet or six feet below the surface.

A pike perhaps discovers the minnow and makes a dash for it, but the eccentric movements of the latter deceive him, and he misses the prize. Again and again he returns to the attack each time more slowly until a convenient opportunity is offered to strike him. Very often he comes to a dead stand-still below the minnow, following it slowly to the surface, if it is gradually raised and kept roving.

The spear used neccessarily has a short handle. It is kept with its point resting on the edge of the ice-hole ready for instant use. A stout cord is attached to the handle for its recovery.

Excellent sport can be obtained in this manner all through the winter months, and large fine fish taken, which being thrown outside the shanty soon freeze, and are brought to the table in better flavor than at any other season of the year. It is astonishing that this plan is not more generally known and practiced, being wholly free from the objections to netting as it is no butchery and does not unduly thin out the game.

There are several lakes near McHenry, in the State of Illinois, which are dotted with scores of these shanties from the time the ice becomes fairly solid until spring warns their owners to remove to a better foundation.

The conductor looked around and shuddered, as with a husky voice he replied simply, "yes."

And then the inquisitive passenger became garrulous and familiar. He sat down beside the conductor and poked him in the ribs as he lightly said: "Ah, I see. Going to get married and quit the road. Going to marry a farmer's daughter. Worth much?"

"She's worth a million to me."

Further remarks in a similar vain did the passenger make, but the conductor deigned no more replies. Suddenly the whistle of the locomotive gave a long, low moan, the conductor stuck his eyes still closer to the window, seemed to fasten his gaze upon some object in the darkness, and then fell back in his seat with a cry of despair upon his lips.

The passengers gathered round to inquire the nature of the trouble, when the brake man assisted his chief to rise and led him into the baggage car. The conductor's face was as white as the snow-banks which fringed the iron roadway, and his eye was a look of tearless grief.

"Poor Sam!" said the brakeman, upon his return; "it's a bad night for him. Four weeks his little girl had been ill. Night after night he was at her bed, but then she got better and he came back to his train. He arranged with his wife that if all was well with the little one she'd display a lighted lamp right in the window of the sick-room. The boys all knew it, and every night we looked for the light almost as eagerly as Sam himself. He lives by the side of the track back a few miles—and to-night there was no light in the window for Sam."

An Electrical Crematory.

An electrical crematory is said by the Philadelphia Ledger to have been devised by a process described as follows:—The body, being shrouded in sheets made of asbestos, is laid upon a frame composed of fire-brick, while at the head and foot are large copper plates, to which the leads from specially constructed dynamos of large electromotive force are attached. The body apparently occupies the position of the filament in an incandescent lamp, and, upon the current being passed through it, would be instantly carbonized; while, as the air would have free excess to it, the process of destruction, or rather decomposition would be immediate. This process appears to have the recommendation of great rapidity of action, and freedom from many of the objections to cremation in the ordinary way, and admits of several little improvements upon all recognized forms of burial.

Six million barrels of beer are consumed annually in this city, at a cost to the consumers of at least $80,000,000. Since more than half the population never drink beer at all, those who do average over $100 a year apiece for it, even allowing, as the Sun suggests, that the people who come from out of town drink a good deal of it. This seems rather an expensive luxury.—N. Y. Mail and Express.

DEAR SIR,—I am pleased to express my extreme satisfaction at the results of your "NEW METHOD" of Inhalation which has cured me of Catarrh of a very troublesome character; in fact all the usual remedies failed to give me any relief, but your Treatment, from the first, gave great ease, and in a few months entirely cured me of a most annoying disease. Johnny laboriously lugged a pail into the parlor where the family were assembled, and asked his maternal grandmother to kick it. "Why should I kick it Johnny?" grandmother inquired in amazement. "Just to amuse papa," said Johnny. "He said he would give ten dollars any time to see you kick the bucket."

A WRINKLE WORTH KNOING.—"The way to keep your windows from being enameled with frost," said a Chicago mercnant, "is to rub them once or twice a week with a rag dipped in glycerine. I have found this to be the only way to keep my show window clean. The discovery has been worth many dollars to me, but I don't mind letting the cat out of the bag."

Reasons why you should purchase Fluid Lightning in preference to all other remedies are Rapid result—cures instantly. It is easily applied—no trouble—no lost time. It dose not require constant use—one application is effectual. One bottle will remove more pain than any other remedy in existence. Try it for Neuralgia, Toothache Headache, Rheumatism. A FINE Persian Lamb Cap was taken from the house of George Walker, Esq. Markdale, last Saturday night or Sunday, and one of similar make but poorer quality left in its place. It was doubtless taken in mistake, and the person will confer a favor by returning it at their earliest convenience, as the cap belonged to the late lamented Mr. Elliott.

ONE of the most severe and prolonged snow storms in the history of the country has been experienced since New-Year's, extending throughout the Dominion and part of the United States. Railway traffic has been seriously impeded, and the roads in the country generally, are badly blocked with snow, so much so that business is almost at a stand-still. Our railway trains has we are proud to say, been very little delayed notwithstanding the severity of the storm.

STILL IN THE LAND OF THE LIVING.—Mr. W, Reid a barrister who formerly practiced in this county, is at Burk's Falls, Parry Sd. district and doing an excellent practice. He was nominated as reeve this year, for Armour Tp. and if he had accepted the nomination his return was certain, at least to say Mr, John Livingstone, who has been at Burk's Falls an a visit.—[Durham Chronicle.

Creemore Advertiser: We believe that our village can boast of having the most polite old lady on record. On getting on the train the other morning, this old lady knocked for admission. When interviewed by the conductor as to her reason for so doing, she replied, "the people told me that it was a slow parlor coach that moved on this line and the occupants being so long together looked upon it as home and it would have been very rude for me to break the harmony of the home circle." The conductor looked "wild cats" as he shouted "all abord" and whistled to the driver to "let her bile."

PARTNERSHIP.—It will be seen by reference to our advertising columns that Drs. Sproule and Brodie of this town have entered partnership for the practice of their profession, which agreement is now in operation. This arrangement will doubtless add strength and influence, as well as usefulness to our respected M. D's. Dr. Sproule is a physician and surgeon of undoubted ability and extensive practice, while Dr. Brodie, though but a short time in our town, is already widely known as a physician of more than ordinary ability. He is remarkably attentive to his patients and is becoming more popular every week. Dr. Sproule's office will remain in Turner's Drug Store and Dr. Brodie's in Mathews new block.

Dentinck H[illegible] Brigham Esq. Glenelg Jno. McMillan Esq. Artemesia Jas Brodie Esq. Durham D. W. Horn, Esq. Proton, Thos. Hanbury Esq.

THE constant stream of farmers teams, from 20 miles around laden with wheat to be exchanged for roller flour is proof positive that the ladies know where first-class flour can be procured, and the following figures will afford some idea of the business done at Victor Roller Mills, Markdale: Our first year, from the 15th Nov. '84 to 1st Nov. '85 our gristing amounted to 18,851 bushels, second year to 1st Nov, '86, 22,577 bushels, and the two last months of the year '86, 5,400, making in all 46,828 bushels; it is thus evident that the roller flour pocess has advantages which command a greatly increased trade from year to year. We return most hearty thanks to our numerous customers in general, and the farmers of the district in particular, for liberal patronage in the paust, and trst our future business relations may prove as satisfactory as the past. Angus Plewes.

A young mother should not be too ambitious to correct her children. She should begin at the bottom.

THE LAST YEAR, 1886.

After the above year is ended there need be no more suffering from Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Toothache, Headache, Lumbago, or any acute pain, if they only purchase a bottle of Fluid Lightning, as it cures instantly. Pain cannot stay where it is used. The name is Fluid Lightning. Sold by R. L. Stephen, Druggist, Markdale. 2

"What does your husband do?" asked the census man. "He ain't doin' nothin' at this time of the year," said the young wife. "Is he a pauper?' asked the census man. Understanding him to say "papa" "Law no!" she exclaimed, somewhat indignantly; "we ain't been married more'n six weeks.

THREATENED DANGER.—In the fall of '84, Randall Miller, of Maitland, N. S., was prostrated to his bed with an attack of incipient consumption. Cough remedies had failed. He rapidly grew debilitated, and friends despaired of his recovery. He tried Burdock Blood Bitters, with immediate relief, followed with a speedy cure.

SUITING THE WORD TO THE ACTION.—A New York Sunday School teacher told her pupils that when they put their pennies into the contributing box she wanted each one to repeat a Bible verse suitable for the occasion. The first boy dropped in his cent, saying: "The Lord loveth a cheerful giver." The next boy dropped his penny into the box, saying: "He that giveth to the poor lendeth to the Lord." The third and youngest boy dropped in his penny, saying: "A fool and his money is soon parted."

THE DEAF MADE TO HEAR.—"After eight years suffering from deafness so bad that I was unable to attend to my business, I was cured by the use of Hagyard's Yellow Oil. With gratitude I make this known for the benefit of others afflicted." Harry Ricardo, Toronto.

GREAT FALL OF ROCK AT NIAGARA.

Prospect House, Niagara Falls, Jan. 14.—That portion of the rugged bank nearest the Horseshoe Falls, on the Canada side known as Upper Table Rock, fell at midnight Wednesday night with a deafening crash that was heard and the concussion felt for over a mile away. Thousands of tons of solid rock fell into the gorge below, carrying with it tons of ice. The exact position of the breaking is between the Prospect House and the Great Horseshoe Falls, just above the old Table Rock and next to the spiral stairway leading to the path behind the sheet of water. The Government iron railing for over 150 feet was carried away. Had this fall of rock occurred in the daytime undoubtedly a loss of lives would have been added, The formation of the precipice is entirely changed. One can stand on the bank above and see behind the heavy sheet of water into a dark chasm. The mass that fell is over 100 feet in length by about 60 feet in width and 170 feet deep of limestone and slate. One hundred and twenty three thousand yards of rock is calculated to have fallen. The supposed cause of the rock giving away is the low water, steady freezing weather for the past three weeks, and the heavy weight of accumulated ice.

The Law Concerning Newspapers.

1. Any person who takes a paper regularly from the post-office, whether directed in his name, or another's, or whether he has subscribed or not, is responsible for payment

2. If a person orders his paper discontinued, he must pay all arrears, or the publisher may continue to send it until payment is made, and then collect the whole amount, whether the paper is taken from the office or not.

2. In suits for subscriptions, the suit may be instituted in the place where the paper is published, although the subscriber may reside hundreds of miles away.

4. The courts have decided that refusing to take newspapers or periodicals from the post-office or removing and leaving them uncalled for, while unpaid, is prima facie evidence of intentional fraud.

RELICS.

BY LIZZIE IRONS FOLSOM.

A crumpled, small, pink envelope with a scent of white rose, and a small cupid blazing in red wax on the seal; essentially a woman's letter, and, I am very much inclined to believe that the contents were dictated by the cupid on the outside.

I say this with all due modesty, and, as the letter passed into oblivion and ashes long ago, you cannot prove that it was otherwise.

Perhaps it is hardly fair for me to sit here alone, at my desk, and make such statements about the dainty souvenirs that, a long time ago, I tucked so safely away.

I can charge these feminine knick-nacks with coming to me—one and all—upon tender and loving missions, and, with insinuating tenderness creeping into my heart and life—and there is no one here to contradict me. If you think it hardly the square thing, I will, to strike a balance, admit that I was once madly, widly in love with each and every token, for the sake of the sender—or thought I was, which amounts to the same thing at the time.

This little pink envelope—I wish I had the letter—is soiled and musty; but I dare say that when it came I caught it to my lips and covered it with kisses; I always did that sort of thing, I was so terribly in earnest—for a while. Maud was much given to writing dainty notes and, at one time, I might have papered my walls with this same little pink paper; but the thought then would have been sacrilege! I wore them next my heart—that is, I wore twenty or thirty of them, all that I could without exciting remark. And, I recollect that it was my custom to take them out and kiss each one, gently and reverently, before I went to bed.

That exercise must have been, towards the close of our acquaintance, extremely protracted. Our love died a natural death—slowly and painlessly—and the last time that I saw Maud she introduced me to a flaxen-haired husband and a sour and cross-eyed baby which she said was hers. And now I take her musty envelope and drop it in my waste-basket and brush from my fingers the dust of a vanished past.

A little withered bunch of flowers, that crumbles away at my touch. The leaves seem to shrink away from my fingers as if they recognized that I am old, worn and blase, and scatter over my desk—a dusty, musty lot they are. They are before me as the sole relic of the hour when they and I were Lottie's. She was crying when she slipped them into my hand and whispered "Good-bye" between her sobs. She was little Lottie Linden when her father carried her off to Europe to escape my unwelcome attentions; but she was N. Charlotte Lynden when she stepped again upon Canadian soil. A very trim and English young lady it was who gave me the tips of two fingers and found it quite impossible to sound her r's.

A slender gold band, with a broken padlock dangling from it. This came back to me one day and, figuratively speaking, blotted me from the face of the earth. I never knew what caused itt o be sent, but a stern note, with Leslie's signature, gave me to understand that "it was all over."

All explanation was denied me, and—unless it was my rival's tandem team—I never knew what caused the downfall of my castles in the air. I have always thought it was the team, and, with my large experience of woman-nature now before me, I am sure of it. I said that I was heart-broken—I am not sure but that I cried. And I distinctly remember going down on my lavender knees on the grass under her window and staying there all one long summer night. What a spectacle I must have been!

I remember the evening I locked this bracelet on Leslie's dimpled wrist, as we strolled through the orchard under the pink and white blossoms massed above our heads. I held her hands—dear, little, soft hands they were—and the blushes came and went on the feminine cheek so near mine.

And I think the grasses held their breath to catch our whispered words, and the little, brown birds nudged each other with their wings and rolled their round eyes knowingly, as we passed. And we vowed eternal faithfulness and found our lives all rose-colored. And all this strong and deep-seated affection, one tandem team whisked away before my very eyes! I am glad you broke the bracelet, Leslie. It is all that kept me from locking it on many another just as white a wrist, since then.

The days of my foolishness were long and many, but I am out of it all now, unscarred and unshattered.

A small round picture, evidently once cherished, in a locket. I turn it to the light. Discolored, cracked and bent, it still bears some likeness to the bright, brunette face of the original. She was the nicest of them all, and for three months I lived but in her presence. Her home was the third floor, back, of a cheap lodging house, and I don't believe her parentage would have been reassuring if looked into; but I was desperately enamored. I forgot the past. I forgot every dear creature whose love had cast a temporary glow from paradise across my pathway. I vowed the old vows with fresh ardor, and the time-worn loving epithets gathered new tenderness when whispered to Mignon. There was nothing near, and dear, and sweet enough to murmur in that listening ear against my coat collar. I quite forgot what came along to draw us apart. Strange that I should, when I was so in earnest! It may have been that she tired—it may have been that I did—but, still, I have a half recollection that there was a third party in the case. However that may be, her picture was pried out of my locket and that of stately Julia inserted in its place, and my heart repaired its damaged works, and started briskly on. A way it always had, and a cheery and comfortable way, enough.

I would expect to suffer. Would desire and intend to, as quite the proper thing to do, alas! in the midst of my mourning, a glance from a strange pair of eyes or a touch of a taper hand would raise me from my sackcloth and ashes, high to the blest and shining pinnacle of love. It was always so.

Here is a small and wrinkled bunch of kid. I smooth it out upon my desk. A small, pearl-colored glove, with the initials, L. H. upon the inside. It belonged to Louise. Pretty, fair-haired, little Louise.

Such a mite of a glove! And as I hold it I can almost fancy that the years, the gray hairs, and the wrinkles, have never been, and that I hold again the dear hand that has so long been stilled forever. Just here, I can see the print of the pink, soft finger tips and against the back, the blood in her blue veins throbbed. And here lay the cool, pink palm with its broken life-line. And at the thought of the smooth, fair skin that the long wrist covered, a lump comes into my throat, which, were I not so old and careless and bitter, I would almost think the little glove had brought.

The air has grown so full of mist—there must be rain outside—that I can hardly see the pearl-white glove before me, which I will lock away until some time when the sun shines in and my eyes see clearer.

But can I lock up all my power of memory? Can I lock up the rapture of kisses; or the heart that grows sick with longing for the dear, dead past? Can I lock up the touch of soft fingers, that sends the blood dancing madly through my veins? Can I lock up the memory of those fair, fond days; when the gates of Heaven opened and took me in? Those days when life was love; and love was life—for Louise and I.

I feel that I am standing by an open grave, within which lies all that might have been great and good in me; within which lies, beside the pearl-tinted glove, my youth within its unfulfilled promise; my hope and trust and the one true love of my life.

The wind blows cold across me, and I push aside my trinkets with hands that tremble. I rub my eyes to clear away the mist, and look about me with my old, serene, affable nonchalance.

But my heart is not at rest, and I wonder if ever it will be, again.

"Ay! There's the Rod."

Youthful scion of a noble house: "I have come to ask for the hand of your daughter, doctor?" Fashionable physician: "You have?" Youth: "Yes, doctor. I have enough of this world's goods to support her in comfort, even in luxury." Physician: "Yes, I am aware of that; but will you treat her kindly? Can I depend upon your making her a good husband?" Youth: "Doctor I swear—." Physician: "Oh, never mind swearing, my young friend! Your intentions are all right; but I must be sure that you won't worry her life out after you get her. Take off your coat, and let me sound you to see what condition your liver is in."

A Coming Juryman.

A wealthy gentleman interrogates his son's teacher as to the boy's capabilities.

"You have been giving private lessons to my son for more than a year?"

"Yes, sir; it's more than a year."

"Well, by this time you must have got a pretty good idea as to his capabilities."

"I think I have."

"Now tell me, candidly, has he not got a remarkable intellectual grasp?"

"Indeed he has; quite remarkable, in fact."

"Ah! I am glad to hear it."

"Yes; I think I can truthfully say that he grasps the simplest problem with the greatest imaginable difficulty."

Ultima.

Better be sickly and poor, better be shabbily clad,
Better be homely and meek, better be dirty and bad,
Better be anything else upon earth—anything else but a cad;
The sick may recover their health, a check make a swell of a tramp,
The homely may fascinate hearts, and a saint may evolve from a scamp;
The weak may grow strong, and the dirty get clean,
The thin may grow fat, and the fat may grow lean,
But you never can, never can—never erad,
The deep-rooted dirt from the soul of a cad.

He Gave it up.

"My dear," said an affectionate wife to her husband, "I am so glad that you have given up drinking. It is a terribly degrading habit, and I am delighted that my denunciations of it have had their effect."

"Yes," said hubby, puffing away at his Regina, "I bet Fawkins five baskets of wine on it, that I could leave off till next New Year's day, and I'm going in to win."

Too Far Ahead.

"What do you want?" she snapped, as she held the front door open about three inches.

"Want to clean the snow off yer sidewalk," he replied.

"But it is clean."

"Then I want to engage to saw some wood for you next summer. The exigencies of the case demand that I get hold of some breakfast somehow or other right off."

A Very Common Kind of Skin Eruption.

Maud—"Pa, my chin feels sore as if I was getting some kind of a skin eruption."

Pa—"How long have you had it?"

Maud—"I've only noticed the prickling sensation during the last few days."

Pa—"Tell that fellow, who calls to see you so much, to shave. This under the miseltoe business has been overdone."

A Point of View.

Mrs. K. (in great consternation): Oh, what have I done? What have I done?

Herr T. (examining the painting): Nefer mind, Madam; I am quite sure I can soon make it all right.

Mrs. K.: Make it right! What can you ever do, when its a pattern dress and I haven't a bit of the goods for a new sleeve?

What the Prayed For.

Mother—"Did you pray in your Sunday school to-day, Johnny?"

Johnny—"Yes, mamma."

Mother—"That's a good little boy, always pray in Sunday School.

Father—"But what did you pray for?"

Johnny—"I prayed for it to let out."

Matrimonial Regulations.

Emma—"Reggy, darling, when we are married you will not smoke in the house, will you?"

Reggy—"No, love, the fellows will expect me at the club, you know." Still, Emma is not happy.

A TOBOGGANING SONG.

BY JOHN IMRIE, TORONTO.

'Tis "Hurrah! hurrah!" and away they go,
Like an avalanche o'er the crispy snow!
With a rush and a bound they clear the ground,
While the snow, like spray, dashes all around!
They think not of death,
Yet they hold their breath,—
Now in a hollow!—now cresting a hill!—
Now guiding the craft to prevent "a spill!"
See! the fresh warm blood to their faces rush
As they peep from the robes with roses' blush!
In the clear moonlight,
What a happy sight,—
As the maiden clings with a tender fear
To the kind loving arm that holds her near!
Through the clear cold air of the frosty night
The twinkling stars seem to dance with delight!
With speed of the wind—
Leaving all behind—
They rush to the plain with a shout of glee,
As merry and happy as hearts can be!

THE COMMANDMENTS.

Theologians of prominence are discussing the original form of the Ten Commandments, and the Bishop of Carlisle suggests that they were given to Moses in the following condensed form:

1. Thou shalt have none other God before Me.
2. Thou shalt not make thee any graven image.
3. Thou shalt not take the name of Jehovah, thy God, in vain.
4. Thou shalt remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy.
5. Thou shalt honor thy father and the mother.
6. Thou shalt not kill.
7. Thou shalt not commit adultery.
8. Thou shalt not steal.
9. Thou shalt not bear falsewitness.
10. Thou shalt not covet.

Apropos of this are the following five commandments of the Buddhists, recently published in The Brooklyn Eagle, in a series of articles on Buddhism, which is the only religion that condemns intoxication as a crime. The five commandments of Buddhism are all of a negative character. Their violation must be not only a complete act, but also intention. They are:

1. Thou shalt abstain from destroying or causing the destruction of any living thing.
2. Thou shalt abstain from acquiring or keeping by fraud or violence the property of another.
3. Thou shalt abstain from those who are not proper objects of thy lust.
4. Thou shalt abstain from deceiving others either by word or deed.
5. Thou shalt abstain from intoxication.

Catarrh, Catarrhal Deafness and Hay Fever.

Sufferers are not generally aware that these diseases are contagious, or that they are due to the presence of living parasites in the lining membrane of the nose and eustachian tubes. Microscopic research, however, has proved this to be a fact, and the result is that a simple remedy has been formulated whereby catarrh, catarrhal deafness and hay fever are cured in from one to three simple applications made at home. A pamphlet explaining this new treatment is sent free on receipt of stamp by A. H. Dixon & Son, 305 King Street West, Toronto, Canada.

CHAPTER XXI.—(CONTINUED.)

"One pen—one ink—one paper. I will bring him all up; I, myself. Let me—oh, let me!"

"Why, he's out of his mind!" said Bowline. "Look how he shakes and how white he looks. One would think, mates, he had hid something down below that he was afraid some of us would see."

Captain Mocquet laughed hysterically.

"No—no; I not hide something—ha ha! I see him all below—pen, et ink, et paper. All is well. I bring him. I feel much weller now. Ah, mes braves, I buy the Rift. Tout bein—ha, ha, ha! I bring him up—ha, ha, ha!

Petite brilliante,
A l air mignon,
Plus belle amante,
Tu no crains personne!

Ha, ha! I bring him. I bring him. Wait, wait, wait!"

Captain Mocquet descended the hatchway, which he had himself opened, and Dolan and the crew of the Rift looked at each other in surprise at the amount of strange emotion exhibited by the Frenchman and the lugubrious attempts he had made at merriment.

"I say," whispered Bowline to one next him, "these Frenchmen, I don't think, are quite right in their wits when anything goes a little wrong with them."

"I should think not."

"Here he is!" cried Captain Mocquet, appearing on the deck with a rush that made Dolan start two steps backward. In his hands he had writing materials, which he eagerly placed on the capstan.

"Here he is. I shall write one order. There! One hundred thousand francs. He is done, and liberty and the Rift is mine—eh?"

"Yes," said Dolan, as he took the order, "as soon as we have the money for this."

"The money?"

"Yes; you don't suppose that we are going to let you and the Riit go, just for this bit of paper, do you?"

Captain Mocquet had not supposed so and he bowed and smiled as he replied:

"It is well—so, so. I will stay on the Rift, and the cabin—the chief cabin—will be mine, and no one will come to him. That is arrange—eh, Capitaine Dolan?"

"That's fair," said Martin.

Captain Mocquet turned and made a low bow to Martin, who then said:

"But how are we to get the money?"

"I will go to Havre and get it for you all," said Dolan.

"And then?"

"Why, then I will divide it among you."

"But if we separate, all of us, to-morrow night, how are we to get the division made, mates I should like to know?"

"I will meet you on the Common Hard, at Portsmouth." said Dolan, "on this day week, or anywhere you like to name."

"Now, mates," added Martin, "I don't half like that way of doing things. We can't spare our captain; and I, for one, don't want to go to the Common Hard at Portsmouth. I don't see the harm of staying here another week in the cavern, and I think the best person to go and get the money is Mocquet himself."

"Mocquet?" said Dolan.

"For he's a Frenchman and can get on better than you or any of us would. I think we ought to go on to Havre and send him on shore to get the money He will then, on coming back with it, be all right, and we can get landed on the English coast and give him up the Rift. He can bring two or three Frenchmen on board with him, just to hold the cutter in hand, and then the whole affair will be right and ship-shape.

"Ay, ay," cried the crew; "that's it."

"And so," said Dolan, sneeringly, "you think you would get Mocquet back again if you let him set his foot on shore."

"I will answer for him."

"You, Martin?"

"Yes, Captain Dolan, I will answer for him with my share of the plunder and profit and with my life. Mates will you take my word for it? You all know me?"

"Ay, ay," shouted the men; "that will do."

"Very well," said Dolan, bitterly; "do what you please."

"And we will take care of the order for the hundred thousand francs," said Martin. "Eh, mates?"

"Yes, yes! That's it."

"Oh, my gallant crew!" sighed Dolan. "Do you doubt me? Perish the thought! We will have no doubt of each other. Captain Mocquet, when we are off Havre, can and will easily write another order for the money, and rather than this should be a bone of contention among us, let it perish. There! There!"

Captain Dolan drew from his pocket a slip of paper, and in a moment, holding it in the flame of one of the lanterns, he consumed it and it flared into tinder.

"Oh, indeed?" muttered Martin.

"And now, my men," added Dolan, "as that is all arranged and settled, and as we quite understand each other about that little piece of business, let us look to our own affairs. Is all the cargo shipped?"

"Ay, sir! Ay, ay!"

Dolan then blew a long, low note upon a silver whistle he took from his pocket and a strange commotion immediately ensued in and about the sea cavern. There was the creaking of pulley blocks and the flapping of canvas, and then a wild rush of cold air came howling and roaring from the open bay in the sea cavern.

The canvas covering of the narrow, jagged entrance to that mysterious place had been removed and the wind and the waves came in without let or hindrance. The Rift, although well secured, felt the influence of sea and air and pitched for a few moments heavily at her moorings.

The laden boats washed to and fro and in some instances fouled each other, and most of the torches and lanterns were at once extinguished. The roar and the hiss of the sea in the bay came far more plainly upon the ears of all in the sea cavern, and millions of little particles of spray filled the air.

"Silence all, now," said Dolan.

There was a profound sort of hush in the cavern, which seemed to be only the abode of the wind and the water.

"All lights out!"

Every lantern and torch was extinguished.

Then Dolan—just as the last light hissed in the water, into which it was thrust as a ready extinguisher, went out—dropped by a rope from the deck of the Rift, into the foremost boat and took the tiller-ropes in his hands.

"Pull away!" he said.

Six oars dipped into the water at once and the boat shot slowly out into the bay. One rower only was in each of the other boats to give help in their progress, as they were all in a line. The sea cavern was in the charge of four of the crew and the remainder lolled about in the boats among the contraband goods that had been taken from the Coquette.

And so, right out into the little bay, went Dolan with his last venture of the Rift—half piratical and half smuggling as that venture was—and the boats pulled for the promontory to the east of the bay.

CHAPTER XXII.—SUPRISED BY THE REVENUE OFFICERS.

That night in the channel was what seamen call "dirty." In addition to a precarious kind of puffy wind, that succeeded, at times, to be quite undecided as to what point of the compass it would blow from, there was at times a cold, scattering mist, and the darkness was as profound as the most enthusiastic smuggler could wish it to be.

By the wash of the sea, as the tide was coming in—and made sort of circular rush into the little bay—the progress of the boats from the cavern was good, until the promontory was rounded, and then they found themselves in a chopping, uncertain sea, that rendered their movements difficult.

About a mile ahead of them—not above six or eight feet from the surface of the water—burned a solitary light, which had the faculty of presenting different colors to the observation of those at sea at intervals.

The fact was, that this light was inclosed in a lantern, the four sides of which had each a different colored glass—red, blue, yellow and a very pale green. The lantern was mounted on a buoy, which was allowed to drift out into the sea at the end of a tow-line.

It was one only a signal to the smugglers' boats.

"Keep in," said Dolan in a low voice. "You see the light?"

"Ay, ay."

"Starboard oars, easier there! That will do. Now, give way! That is over."

Dolan meant that the boat had got round the promontory sufficiently to be sheltered considerably by it; but the other boats were still, so to speak, outside, and exposed to the full wash of the channel sea.

A very few minutes though, sufficed to bring them into the smoother water; and then, as the parti-colored lantern bobbed up and down on the waves, the boats in line—there were four of them—like some black serpent—made their way to the beach.

That was the beach on which those sham fisherman's cottages were situated, and where Mrs. Wagner affected, at times, to keep house for Dolan, under the name of Mrs. Dolan.

Then Captain Dolan took from his pocket a little tin case, and from that a coiled-up match, which he refolded into the length of about ten inches, and then lighting the end he held it up and waved it to and fro.

Rapidly, then, the parti-colorhd lantern was drawn through the water by its guide-rope and extinguished on the beach.

"All's right," said Dolan as he threw the remains of the match into the sea. "Easy, my men—easy."

He bent low to the teller-ropes and kept his eyes fixed on the shore. He was steering finely.

With a grating sound the keel of the boat touched the light shingle and the sand on the beach and then Dolan threw aside the tiller-ropes and sprang into the sea.

"Bless my heart and life!" said a voice. "Is that you, my dear sir?"

"Mr. Suffles?" said Dolan.

"Hush—oh, don't, my dear sir—oh hush! Call me Brown, Smith or Tompkins; but, good gracious! not Suff—hem! I was nearly saying it myself. You don't know what a job I have had."

"Indeed!" said Dolan, as a few steps of wading brought him on to the beach.

"Yes, Mr. Dolan! I beg your pardon—I believe you have a partiality for being called captain—Captain Dolan, I mean. You would hardly believe what a bother I have had."

"What about?"

"Why, my dear sir—bless my life!—of course to put the Preventives on the wrong scent. I think I may take upon myself to say that they are about five miles off, chasing a cask, with an old sail to it and a lantern. He!—he! That was my invention, Captain Dolan! You take a cask, about a thirty-six gallon, then you—"

"Another, Mr. Suffles—"

"Hush—hush!—Smith."

"Well, then, Smith. Now to business."

"Hum! Much of cargo?"

"Excellent."

"How much! Money is so very scarce, Captain Dolan, that really I was in doubt if I could, or ought to, come down at all to-night to make you an offer, only I saw the signal on the corner of the rock, and I said to myself. 'No, no,' says I, 'if I can offer ever so little to Captain Dolan for his venture, it is my duty to go and offer it,' Hem!"

"Is that all?"

"My dear sir!"

"Very good. Five hundred pounds.

"What?"

"Five hundred pounds."

"Five—Oh, Lord!—hundred—good gracious!—pounds. Oh, dear! oh, dear!"

"Too much?"

"My dear Captain Dolan! Really now! Bless my life! Oh! oh! Too much, indeed! Ha! Absurd! Five—hundred—pounds! Ch—ch—ch! Five—"

"Very good, Mr. Suffles. If the venture don t suit you, I will go to sea with it again, and we will find somebody on the Suffolk coast to take it. I know its value—you don't. Good night. Now, my men, push off!"

"Stop! stop! you are so very precipitate."

"Mr. Suffles, in a word, time is life or death to us. Will you take these four boat loads of contraband for £500 or not? You know you can trust me. You have dealt with me long and you have never repented it."

"Say four hundred."

"No."

"Four hundred and fifty."

"No."

"Very well. Digmouse."

"Yes, sir."

Captain Dolan started as this "yes sir." was said in a strange, snuffling kind of tone quite close to him.

"Digmouse," added Mr. Suffles, "get ready."

"Yes, sir."

"What an odd fellow and what an odd name!" said Dolan.

"Yes, but invaluable. He is the clerk of the church."

"Indeed."

"Oh, yes; but we all smuggle down here and do the best we can. It's in the air, Mr.—I beg pardon—Captain Dolan, and I believe that if the Chancellor of the Exchequer were to come and live here for a year, he would try to cheat the revenue some dark night. Oh, here we are now!"

Creaking down to the beach came some half dozen light carts, each drawn by a strong, young, active horse and driven by a boy. The active scene that now ensued was, or would have been, quite a sight to see, could any eyes but those accustomed to the work have penetrated the gloom in which it was all conducted.

Not a light was permitted to be seen, but the process of unloading the boats and loading the light carts was conducted with a rapidity and skill only to be acquired by practice.

"Now, Mr. Suffles," said Dolan, "the money."

"You are so sharp, my dear friend. There it is."

"One, two, three, four, five—hundred pound notes."

"Yes. Digmouse."

"Yes, sir."

"Does he never say anything but 'Yea, sir?" said Dolan.

"Very seldom."

A kind of yell—a half scream, half yell—at this moment burst from the lips of some one a considerable distance off, and it was faintly echoed by Mr. Suffles, as he said:

"Digmouse! Digmouse! The Philistines!"

"The what?" cried Dolan.

"Lost. Found, I mean. Give me back the notes—at once—quick! The Philistines—good gracious!—quick—the notes."

Dolan uttered a brutal kind of laugh and sprang forward to the boats.

"Push off—push off!" he cried. "To sea! to sea at once, or all are lost!"

"Hold!" cried a loud voice. "We fire if a single man stirs. Now, on, my preventives."

"The lieutenant," gasped Mr. Suffles, and he fell flat on to the beach.

"Push off!" said Dolan.

The boats' keels grated on the beach. There was a rush of footsteps and the temporary flare of a lantern, which went out again in a moment, and then some one flung his arms round Dolan as he was about to jump into the boat.

"You are my prisoner!"

"No."

"Yes. Oh, God!"

Dolan had plunged a long, double-bladed poinard into the back of the man and then he vaulted into the boat.

"Fire!" cried a voice.

"Stoop!" roared Dolan.

There was a rattling discharge of pistols, the flash of which lighted up the faces of a strong party of preventive seamen, headed by a lieutenant in full uniform, who were on the beach. The crews of the Rift's boats made no hindrance of that discharge of bullets, but pushed off to sea, and got all clear of the beach, just as the preventive men made a rush forward with their drawn cutlasses.

"Never mind," said the lieutenant. "The Nancy is in the offing."

"Oh, indeed," said Dolan, "then that will be all the worse for the Nancy—that is all. Pull away!"

"Aye, aye, sir."

The common danger seemed to have completely, for the moment, restored the authority of Dolan; and his crew treated him with an amount of respect they were far from according to him in the sea cavern. They felt and knew the advantage, in moments of danger, of having one directing head. Rapidly the boats left the beach, on which now a number of lights began to show themselves; and then Dolan said, in a deep, low voice:

"Pull for the bay, but not at once for the cavern. Coast the cliff, and keep a good lookout. How many are we?"

"Four sir."

"One, two, three, four—what's that?"

"What, sir?"

"Five. There are five of us."

In the deep gloom—a gloom in which the four boats of the smugglers looked like the backs of four huge black fish in the sea—those who were in Dolan's boat saw, or fancied they saw, astern of the fourth boat, yet another, which kept regular pace with them at about twenty yards' distance.

"The Nancy!" he said.

"Well, that's cool," said Bowline.

"And clever," said Dolan. "She is watching us; and, if she had not been seen, the secret of the sea-cavern would not have been worth a farthing by the morning. We should have a frigate from the station in the bay."

"What's to be done?"

"Pull slack. It's a small boat."

"Ten oars"

"Ah! so much."

"If it's the Nancy, sir; and lying down in her may be a dozen well-armed men,"

"Hum! We shall see. They must go."

"Yes; they must go."

It was evident that a kind of shudder of excitement had passed among the crew of Dolan's boat, for the oars were at that moment not dipped in unison, and one man made a false stroke entirely.

Dolan was stooping, and busily unlocking the locker in the stern of the boat.

"Take the helm!" he said. "I am busy, and shall be busier."

"Ay, ay, sir."

From the locker Dolan took a round substance about the size of a twelve-pound shot. It was carefully wrapped in brown paper, which he tore off in slips, till he came to one portion of the round substance, from which projected a short piece which, to the learned in such matters, would have suggested the idea of the fusee of a shell.

"Pull easy."

The men only lightly dipped their oars into the water; and the fifth boat that followed in the wake of those belonging to the Rift neared Dolan. In fact, owing to the slackened speed of Dolan's boat the others began rather to spread around it in a kind of half circle.

The fifth boat neared rapidly. Then Dolan stood up in the stern of his boat and cried out:

"We give in! No ill-usage and we give in!"

"That will do," said a voice from the fifth boat. "Ship your oars, you rascals."

Dolan then flung the round object he had in his hand on board the fifth boat.

"Take care of that," he said.

"What is it?"

"Divide it among you."

There was then a terrific explosion—a broad sheet of flame, for a moment, lit up the water—and then all was darkness.

The fifth boat was gone! A wailing, sobbing cry—then a shriek. Then all was still.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Words Well Used.

Some expressions are so happy that they stick in the memory like burrs. They are epigrams born like bubbles, and sometimes hardly longer lived than bubbles, but nevertheless as truly forms of art as are those laboriously evolved in the closet.

Some one said of Thorean, "He experienced nature as most people experience religion." What could give one a more emphatic impression of the man's strange personality?

Rufus Choate was constantly throwing off apparently careless utterances which held the germs of genius. In speaking of John Quincy Adam's relentlessness as a debater, he said, "He had an instinct for the jugular vein and the carotid artery as unerring as that of any carnivorous animal."

Of a lawyer who was as contentious as he was dull-witted, he declared, "He is a bull dog with confused ideas."

The courts once demanded that heshoudl find a precedent for a course of action he had proposed.

"I will look, your Honor," he returned, with his peculiar courtesy of manner, "and endeavor to find a precedent, if you require it, though it seems to be a pity that the court should lose the honor of being the first to establish so just a rule."

Of an ugly artist who had painted a portrait of himself he declared, "It is a flagrant likeness." His casual criticisms were full of meaning. After looking through a volume of "Poetry of the East," he said,—

"The Oriental seems to be amply competent to metaphysics, wonderfully competent to poetry, scarcely competent to virtue, and utterly incompetent to liberty."

This was expressio created as a fine art, but those of us who are not geniuses might make it a finer art than we do.

A Startling Fact.

I knew a man who married a sweet and lovely girl. She was very devoted to him, and when she discovered his dissipated habits, she endeavored to shield him. When he stayed out at night, she would send the servants to bed, while she waited and watched for him; and then, in her night-dress and a pair of slippers on her feet, she would glide down very gently and let him in.

One night he came home late. The servants were in bed. The house had a front door, then a marble vestibule, and then an inner door. She opened the one, stepped upon the cold marble, and opened the outer door. The drunken husband entered, seized her by the shoulders, swung her round, opened the inner door, quickly passed through, and locked it before his wife could enter. She would not speak or cry out, lest she should disgrace her husband before the servants.

In the morning she was found with her night-dress drawn under her feet, crouching in the corner, almost chilled to death. On her death-bed she told her father all about it, or the circumstances would never have been known. There is much that is never known, as well as a vast amount of misery and degradation that does crop out, and which is startling in its reality.

Profitable Reading.

The most valuable books are not not invariably approached with pleasure. On the exterior they may be rough, like the bark of the cinnamon tree, but there is an intense sweetness and aromatic flavor within. One has to learn to like them, and he is best able to secure the taste by chewing until the rich savor is developed in the mouth. "Do not mind what you read," said Ed. Sherbrooks; "form a habit or reading and the reading of better books will come when you have a habit of reading the inferior." Though very common, this is not altogether sound advice. Too many people, beginning with trashy literature, which requires no thought, acquire a positive distaste for whatever is solid and serious. The habit of reading worthless and airy books has disqualified them for enjoying what is better. It would be better to begin with what is really valuable and chew away upon it until we reach the inner sweetness, and this will require much less time and effort than to read up through quagmires of trash and mud.

To Preserve the Sight.

1. Do not read or sew with insufficient light.

2. Never read nor study with light coming directly from the front.

3. Never read nor sew in the twilight.

4. Never read nor work in a stooping posture—sit erect.

5. Never read when lying down—this is very trying to the eyes.

6. Hold the book from which you read from 12 to 15 inches from your eyes, and keep the page perpendicular to the line of sight.

7. Never read nor write before breakfast, by candle-light nor gas-light to weariness.

8. Never play tricks with the eyes, as squinting or rolling them.

9. Do not read small print in street or railroad cars while in motion.

10. When engaged in prolonged study, if the eyes become painful, rest them frequently by looking at distant objects.

The Breton's Prayer.

BY R. A. CREIGHTON.

[The Breton mariner offers up a beautiful prayer when he puts to sea. It is this: "Keep me, my God, my boat is so small and Thy ocean is so wide."]

On to the other side my journey lies,
Appalled! I gaze upon an angry sea;
High overhead are no propitious skies,
While waves are sporting with my boat and me

Alone, I brave the tempest and its strife,
Alone, to guide through billows my frail bark;
Alone, to trust my all, my dearest life,
Alone, amid the waves, a desert dark.

My sight quite fails to scan the vast expanse,
Nor will the helm my nerveless arm obey;
My helplessness each terror does enhance
As in their mi ht against me they array.

Still madly on through waves, my little craft,
Groans dismally, as gallantly she strives;
My aching eyes keep looking fore and aft;
Until submerged, alas! Hope in me dies.

The raging forces will not brook control,
No skill of mine can make my heart feel brave;
The wonders of the sea apall my soul,
As yawns its depths, a veritable grave.

"Keep me, my God," I cry in my affright,
Send Thy good angel soon to take the helm;
No compass have I here, no lamp alight;
And rushing waters will my boat oerwhelm.

"Out of the depths" ascends the solemn prayer,
"Keep me, my God" If Thou art by my side
Though waves like mountains rise up everywhere,
I'll bide in peace, though on Thy ocean wide.

"Keep me, my God," surge on thou angry sea,
And thunder storms majestic o'er it ride,
Safely through all shall pass my boat with me
Guided by Thee upon "Thy ocean wide."

The Three Angels.

BY MAUDE L. RADFORD.

Three angels hovered in the air,
And to each other spake:
"Three visits to mortals," said they,
"We immortals will make."

* * * * * * *

A proud lady sat by her harp,
And sang a lovely tune
Of sweet-smelling flowers, and birds,
And the lovely month of June.
And the angels murmured down from Heaven,
"To you talents rich and rare are given."

A strong man in the forest, plied
A bright axe manfully,
Felling many a tough bush, and
Many a noble tree.
And the angels whispered down from Heaven,
"Unto you the gift of strength is given."

A pretty, simple, village maid,
With eyes of heavenly blue,
Thought, as she hummed a little tune,
Of her lover so true.
And the angels whispered down from Heaven
"Unto you the gift of love is given."

And these words came to the maid from above,
The best of God's gifts is the gift of love.

What is Earth?

[The following epigrammatic and singular lines are a complete answer to the question:]

What is earth, Sexton? A place to dig graves.

What is earth, Rich Man? A place to work slaves.

What is earth, Gray Beard? A place to grow old.

What is earth, Miser. A place to dig gold.

What is earth, School Boy? A place for my play.

What is earth, Maiden? A place to be gay.

What is earth, Seamstress? A place where I weep.

What is earth, Sluggard? A good place to sleep.

What is earth, Soldier? A place for a battle.

What is earth, Herdsman? A place to raise cattle.

What is earth, Widow? A place of true sorrow.

What is earth, Tradesman? I'll tell you to-morrow.

What is earth, Sick man? 'Tis nothing to me.

What is earth, sailor? My home is on the sea.

What is earth, Statesman? A place to win fame.

What is earth, Author? I'll write there my name.

What is earth, Monarch? For my realm 'tis given.

What is earth, Christian? The gateway to Heaven.

Poetry and Prose.

It is ten o'clock p. m. Adalbert takes leave of Emma, the object of his affection, to whom he is engaged to be married.

Emma—"Fare thee well, darling of my soul, and when thou gazest on the moon, remember that she who loves thee more than words can tell, also gazes upon yon distant orb and thinks of thee and thee alone."

Five minutes later: "I say, maw, what has become of them cold baked beans that was left over from dinner? I feel as empty as a barrel."

He that sympathizes in all the happiness of others enjoys the safest happiness, and he that is warned by the folly of others has attained the soundest wisdom.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

—So many merely rich men have of late been elected to the United States Senate that it has come to be called "The Houses of Purses." The Globe and the Mail affect to believe that the Canadian Senate is the House of Curses.

—Even the most pacific of the Great Powers, Britian is busy purchasing improved repeaters for its infantry and fresh mounts for its cavalry. We regard this as more ominous than anything that has been done by the big bullies of the continent. When a man whose interests and disposition it is to keep the peace begins to roll up his sleeves there is every prospect of a fight.

—The United States Congress by the passage of the anti-Mormon Bill has inaugurated a firm policy against one of the greatest dangers with which the Republic is menaced. Hitherto the action of the authorities has been somewhat tardy, but the present measure, if it is put into operation, will, it is hoped, have the effect of sweeping away polygamy.

—Mr. Stanley starts from London within a week on his expedition to the North of Uganda, in Central Africa, to relieve Emin Bey, Gordon's lieutenant, He has chosen the Congo in preference to the Zanzibar route. His decision will surprise most people, but Mr. Stanley is the best judge, as he has travelled over both routes and knows the difficulties he will have to encounter by each.

DOMINION ELECTIONS.

The Ottawa Parliament was dissolved last Saturday and the writs issued for an election, nominations to take place on the 15th, and polling on the 22nd February. If the snow blockade would now dissolve we might expect a lively time. The reason given for adopting the course of dissolving the House instead of allowing it to die of old age, which it would have done in September, is that Parliament having widened its constituency by changing the franchise, no longer truely represents the people. The reason is a good one, and exactly that given by Mr. Mowat for advising the Lieut. Governor to dissolve the Ontario Legislature. The Conservatives, who found fault with Mr. Mowat and now upholds Sir John Macdonald, say that Mr. Mowat was not sincere in it, as a session of the Assembly had already been held since the constituency was widened. That was true, but the new election lists had not been prepared until just before Mr. Mowat made his appeal and consequently he could not have appealed to the new consrituency earlier. Sir John also says that the Dominion lists have just been completed. Sir John has also given the regular servant-girl notice, just a month, in which he also followed the example set by Mr. Mowat. The Liberals cannot, therefore, complain of lack of notice, though lately they have been declaring that they need two months in which to get ready. The Conservative journals, which have been showing that it was extremely unlikely that the general elections would be held immediately, are now showing quite as clearly that no other course but that of immediate dissolution was open to the Government, and that every body anticipated it. This sort of thing deceives nobody. Everybody understands that the Government of the day chooses the time for the general elections which suts its own convenience and affords the best chance of success to itself.

GLENELG AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY.

The attendance last Thursday at the annual meeting was not large, but those present took a lively interest in the prosperity and well being of the Society.

The annual report showed a balance in the treasury of $137,16, besides about 60 members which represented another $60, being $50 in excess of the surplus a year ago.

It was decided to have the Agricultural Hall enlarged the coming summer and otherwise improved and increase the facilities for the Fall Show.

The following officers were elected.

At a meeting of the directors which followed, Wm. Haskett was re-elected Sec. Treasurer.

DEATH OF A. ELLIOTT, ESQ.

The sudden death of Mr. Archibald Elliott, ex-deputy reeve of Artemesia on Friday evening last has thrown a gloom over the whole community.

Deceased was in town on Thursday in his usual health, and about 4 o'clock in the afternoon was suddenly prostrated by an attack of billary colic; he was immediately conveyed to the house of Mr. George Walker, his father-in-law and medical aid promptly secured. For several hours he suffered intense agony, which was followed by prostration, and in 30 hours from the attack death ended his sufferings.

THE FUNERAL.

took place on Sunday afternoon to the English Church Cemetry and was very largely attended.

The departed having been a member of the Orange body, the brethren from neighboring lodges turned out in large numbers to pay their last respect to their late lamented brothers 114 of whom (all in morning) headed the cortege, led by Flesherton Brass Band, which played appropriate music. The funeral service was conducted by Rev. Jas. Ward. This was we believe the most imposing funeral that has ever taken place in this district.

Deceased was an industrious and posperous farmer, an excellent neighbor and universally respected citizen, a kind and affectionate husband and father, a man of honor and unquestioned integrity, and we believe a conscientious christian.

He was a member of the Artemesia council 12 years, 5 of which he was depty-reeve, some seven years ago he was appointed a J. P. and in all his public as well as his social and private life his example may be iminated with profit.

He leaves a wife (who is in a weak state of health, and may not survive this heavy affliction) and 5 children, together with a large circle of friends to mourn his premature demise. His age was 46 years 10 months and 17 days.

RUTH ELLIOTT;

OR,

A PROPHECY FULFILLED.

A TALE OF SOCIAL LIFE IN CANADA.

BY W. E. BESSEY, M. D.

PART IV.

'Surely Goodness and Mercy shall follow me all the days of my life.—Ps. xxxiii.

"Two unseen angels in my daily paths attend
Unswerving, from the cradle to the grave,
Full-powered, but for my wilfulness, to save
My feet, my hands, my tongue, from every end
Of error, and of sin, to which they trend,—
Alike most loving, tender, true, and brave,
And in whose high companionship I have
This only pain, that I their grace offend.

How oft do they their silvery bowers leave,
To come to succor us that succor want!
How oft do they with golden pinions cleave
The flitting skies like flying pursuivant,
Against foul fiends to aid us militant!
They for us fight, they watch and duly ward,
And their bright squadrons round about us plant;
And all for love, and nothing for reward;
Oh, why, should Heaven for men have such regard!

And still I offend, how oft—I cannot to myself confess,
Nor dare I think how pure in God's pure view;
Whose faithful angels all my steps pursue,
Their sweet names being Mercy and Goodness."

Five years have elapsed since the death of Arthur Blackstone, and the lovely young widow as she sat on a beautiful Sunday afternoon in July at the organ, singing and playing her favorite hymn, "Lead Kindly Light," with her sweet little blue-eyed, golden-haired daughter of six summers playing at the parlor window looking out on the front—looking her best, more rosy, more youthful and beautiful than ever.

"Oh, mamma, here comes Mr. Bently up the walk, and he's got Carlo with him. I'll run and meet them, can't I, Mamma?"

And before Mamma could reply she was out of the door and down the path to meet Mr. Bently and her friend Carlo. Carlo was a very pretty spaniel dog that little Florence took great delight in playing with, and the dog seemed to be much attached and greatly pleased with his little friend. Mr. Bently made much of the child, for he knew that was the easiest avenue through which to win the mother's heart.

Ruth rose from the organ and was standing in the door ready to welcome her devoted friend and lover—for he had never married. He had been absent over five years in foreign parts, but, always a true friend, he had never ceased to love her, and having returned within the past year and renewed his suit for her affections, was now her accepted and acknowledged lover. It was a pretty sight for the now happy mother as they came along, Mr. Bently taking Florence's hand and she leading the dog by a stick in his mouth. The mother's face beamed with joy as they approached, and ere they had ascended the last steps her hands were on Mr. Bentley's shoulders, and with a gentle chiding for being so late she held up her sweet face to be kissed.

"Wait," she said, "until I get my sunbonnet and we will go down in the grounds; it is much nicer outside than in the house these lovely summer afternoons."

She was not long in finding it, for she was an orderly housekeeper and had a place for everything and everything in its place; and taking his arm and Florence by the hand, they sauntered down the serpentine walk to their favorite retreat where the clustering vines, overhanging the lawn seat, placed against the foot of the great spreading Gilead tree that stood at the end of the walk on the brink of the steep declivity overlooking the valley that stretched away to the south, with its green fields and winding river glistening in the sunbeams; and quiet farm houses in the distance; making it a veritable paradise for love.

Little Florence and Carlo gamboled on the green, while Ruth and Herbert Bently opened their happy hearts to one another, while their tongues, set free, grew eloquent with love's impassioned tale, and eyes "spake love to eyes that spake again." Their's was a love founded on esteem.

"She that would raise a noble love must find Ways to beget a passion for her mind;
She must be that which she to be would seem;
For all true love is grounded on esteem.
Plainness and truth gain more a generous heart
Than all the crooked subtleties of art."

This was a favorite retreat of Ruth's in the quiet summer afternoons; and here in the shelter afforded by the spreading vine she would spend an hour or two with her favorite authors undisturbed. And here, as if by a natural instinct, the lovers sought the seclusion that love delights in. And here they would sit together, sometimes for hours, lover-like, talking of each other, or the beauties of natural objects around them, without weariness, 'dreaming the happy hours away,' until the ringing of the silver tea-bell would call them 'back from the Land Elysian' to partake of refreshment.

"Is not this a lovely spot?" she asked. "How sweet the perfumes which come floating on the breeze. The new mown hay. how I love its odour. And sometimes after a shower, the perfume from these Gilead trees, mingling with the roses and lilacs of the garden, makes the air as redolent with perfumes as it now seems resonant with the subdued murmurs of a thousand musical notes."

"You are fond of flowers, Ruth, I perceive by the large collection of exquisite annuals, perennials, and exotics that adorn your garden?"

"Oh yes, Herbert, they are my friends and constant companions, and they seem to smile for me and speak to me of heaven:

"For who shall say that flowers
Dress not heaven's own bowers
Who its love without them can fancy, or its floor

"Who shall ever dare
To say they spring not there
And come not down that love might bring
One piece of heaven the more.

"Oh pray believe that angels
From those blue dominions
Brought them in their bright laps
Down 'twixt their golden pinions,"

"Oh, there, you are sentimental. I have heard that people in love are thus affected."

"Well, be it so," she replied. "Yes, in love, I am, with nature—sweet, beautiful nature. The world's a paradise to me with its beautiful birds and flowers, and as man is lord of creation, you know, I must include him in the catalogue, and I'm in love with one, too, but he's one after Burns' own heart. You'll find his description in the poem 'A man's a man for a' that.' He's gold that needs no guinea stamp to make him pass current."

"You surprise me with your eloquence. This, then, is your favorite theme?"

"Yes! Oh! see that lovely humming bird," she exclaimed, "as he flits from flower to flower; what pretty things there are in nature. Do you know, sometimes when I sit here in this secluded spot watching that little creature, I wonder how many times a minute those tiny wings move."

"Ah," said he, "that would be a nice calculation to come at, a little more delicate than bargains on stocks and bonds."

"Oh, come now, my dear, leave stocks and bonds out of sight for one day and try to drink in the sweet delights of nature, by which we are surrounded. Look at that bumble bee there, how active he is as he climbs in and out of each flower or scrambles over a head of sweet clover, all the while keeping still as a mute, until he starts on his journey, when he strikes up a humming note as a warning of his approach; some say it is caused by the beating of his wings in the air. Whatever is the cause of that sound it seems to me that summer would not be summer without the presence of these innumerable choristers who enliven their work with song."

"Oh yes," he replied, "I love nature's music, and your conversation recalls those pretty lines of Baldwin's:—

"There's music in the pitying voice of woman, soft and mild.
There's music in the prattle sweet of every little child;
There's music in the voice of youth and of the riper sage,
There's music even in the shrill and quivering voice of age.
There's music in the murmuring shells upon the rocky shore,
There's music in the flap of sails and in the dripping oar.
There's music in the wavelets white that flash upon the strand,
And with a thousand furrows line the smooth and yellow sand.
There's music in the song of birds, the rustling of the leaves;
And in the nodding of the ears amid the harvest sheaves.
Sweet tender songs of nature's voice that like some soothing spell,
Our hearts enthrall and ever in our fondest memory dwell."

"The other day," said Ruth, "I was gathering violets down by the brook in the meadow yonder where they grow in such profusion—violets are my favorite flowers—and the scene and the circumstance recalled these beautiful lines:—

"Down where the river, and little brook meet
Under a tuft of bright green grass,
Hidden away from the wandering feet
Of any one who chanced to pass,
Nestles a lot of violets blue
That bathed in the sun and drank in the dew,
And saw in the river their own rare hue
Reflected as if in glass.

They bloomed in the sunlight, so warm and gay,
And smilingly welcomed each passing shower;
They laughed at the brook as it ran away
And passed their little bower.
They loved the soft breath of the balmy air,
And breathed out a fragrance rich and rare,
So subtle it was—and it was not there—
In the heart of each sweet flower.

No rude hand plucked them out of their place
Away from that cool shady spot,
But the soft wind kissed them with soft embrace,
To show they were not forgot,
And day after day the song of the bird
And the cry of the chirruping cricket was heard
And the heart of each blossom with joy was stirred
And blessed its quiet lot."

"Do you often go botanizing thus?" he asked.

"Not often," she replied, "but it is of thrilling interest to me, for it does seem as if each moss, each shell, each crawling insect, holds a rank important in the plan of Him who framed this scale of beings; hold a rank which, lost, would break the chain and leave behind a gap, which Nature's self would rue."

"To my mind Nature is still, as ever, the thin veil which half reveals, and half conceals the faces, and lineaments supernal of our King. There are frequently hunters of botanical specimens hovering round, and I always welcome them as my friends; because we worship at the same shrine, think the same thoughts and are interested in similar things. The botanists I like best are Asa Gray, Chas. H. Bessey, Dr. Spotton and Mr. Lincoln."

"Take mosses, for instance; how beautiful and how interesting," replied he. "Have you ever studied them?"

"There is a fresh and lovely sight,
A beauteous heap, a hill of moss
Just half a foot in height,
All lovely colors there you see,
All colors that might ever be,
And mossy net-work too is there
As if by hand of lady fair
The work had woven been."

"I have often studied the mosses as I have climbed the mountain heights or visited some moss-covered ruin in the Old World. All travellers do, more or less; for, as you ascend from height to height, the varieties change. Some are simply wonderful to see; words fail to describe them. They reminded me of what Ruskin says of them. He calls them 'meek creatures; the first mercy of the earth, veiling with hushed softness fruitless rocks; creatures full of pity, covering with strange and tender honor the scarred disgrace of ruin—lying quiet upon the tumbling stones to teach them rest.' No words that I know of will say what these mosses are; none are delicate enough, none perfect enough; none right enough to describe them. Strong in lowliness, they neither branch in heat, nor pine in frost. To them, slow fingered, constantly started, is intrusted the heaving of the dark, eternal draperies of the hills; to them, slow-pencilled, Iris-dyed, the tender framing of their endless imagery. Sharing the stillness of the unimpassioned rock, they share also its endurance; and while the winds of departing spring scatter the white hawthorn blossoms like drifted snow; and the summer dims on the parched meadow the droppings its cowslip-gold;—far above among the mountains the silver lichen sports star-like on the stone; and the glittering golden tinges upon the edges of the distant western peaks, reflect the sunsets of ten thousand years."

"Yes," she said, "that is a trip I should like to make, taking in dear old England my father loves so well,—France, Italy, Switzerland and the Alps; to climb Mt. St. Gothard or Mt. Rigi, rest at the Kulm or 'Eagle's Nest' (6000 feet high) and far above the fleecy clouds; rising at early peep of day to witness that wonderful sunrise so many rave about. "Tell me something of your travels, Mr. Bently," said Ruth. "You have been absent for five years—sad and eventful years to me—you have drifted with disabled steamers in the North Atlantic, have been cast away among the Shetland Isles, have seen the 'midnight sun' and the Laps with their reindeers harnessed at North Cape in Norway. You have seen Venice, Genoa, and Lucerne, have climbed the Rigi and seen that gorgeous sunrise far above the clouds; and high up the slopes of the Wengen Alps, have witnessed the descending avalanche from the lofty Jungfrau with its crown of perpetual snow, crashing all before it in its death-dealing progress down the opposite side. You have visited Rome with its relics, Egypt with its Pyramids, Persia with its indolence, India, with its magnificence, profuse wealth and gorgeous temples, China with its strange people, the Yosemite and the towering Rockies on this continent as you returned, now tell me, of all you saw, what pleased or impressed you most?"

"Well, the most profound impression I remember to have felt was when the shaft broke and we found ourselves adrift in a heavily laden ocean steamer, during a stormy season in the North Atlantic. We were three weeks out before we were found and towed into Liverpool by another of the Company's line. It is such a feeling of helpless helplessness, in some sense akin to despair. A passing steamer is signalled and told to say we are disabled, but all right, shaft broken, and under sail. I was amused at a timid clergyman on board, who, growing impatient, troubled the captain a good deal, and also complained of the men swearing. 'Well,' said the Captain, 'so long as you hear them swearing there is no danger,' and immediately he went forward to listen, and returned, saying, 'Thank God, they are swearing still.' I was much impressed by the strange phenomenon of the midnight sun in Norway. I felt, standing on North Cape, as if I were standing on one edge of an egg-shaped body and could watch the sun in his entire circuit. There is no sunset there, during the six months the sun is north of the equator. The British museum, Westminster Abbey, St. Paul's Cathedral, and the Houses of Parliament in London, among other things, pleased and impressed me with their grandeur. But the Louvre of Paris, with its sixteen separate museums, astonished me beyond anything I had ever fancied the art of man could have attained to. To enumerate the wonderful productions of painting and art that are to be seen there would in itself weary you; and the stories of the estates of the Grand Hotel and Grand Magasins de Louvre are the finest in the world and occupy an entire square. The old Louvre is connected with the Tuilleries by the new Louvre and is consitlered in an architectural point of view to be unequalled in palatial beauty. The theatres are very fine and the acting always of a high order. The hacks are cabriolets and reminded me of the calashes of Old Quebec. To a woman Paris is centre of the world, for here fashion takes its cue, and everything that can be devised to attract and captivate a woman's fancy is to be seen in the magnificent shop windows and fronts, or magasins, as they are called. In Switzerland the scenery is overwhelming in its grandeur,—the mountains are lofty and ascended by rail, but the sunrise on the Rigi is something to be remembered for a lifetime. Away above the clouds—earth like a dark mist below—the sunburst forth with a grandeur peculiar to itself, that impresses one as nothing else does. I could think of nothing to so aptly express the wonder it creates in the mind so truly as Moore's poem, beginning:

"Thou art, O God, the life and light
Of all this wondrous world we see,
And we could almost think we gazed
Through golden vistas into Heaven."

"But talking of impressions, there is nothing to compare to the solemnity and awe-like feeling that is felt on entering the great St. Peter's or the Vatican at Rome. No feeling impressed me but grandeur on visiting the Pyramids and Mausoleums of Egypt—or of magnificence in viewing the vast marble temples of India. But in Rome one enters the great St. Peter's and feels as if overshadowed by a long Past, a living Present and an eventful Future."

"Enter! Its grandeur overwhelms thee not;
And why! It is not lessened; but thy mind,
Expanded by the genius of the spot,
Has grown colossal and can only find
A fit abode wherein appear enshrined
Thy hopes of immortality.
Thou art in Rome! a thousand busy thoughts
Rush on my mind, a thousand images,
And I spring up as girt to run a race
Thou art in Rome! The city that so long
Reigned absolute the mistress of the world;
The mighty voice that prophets saw and trembled;
There as though,
Grandeur attracted grandeur, are beheld
All things that strike, ennoble—from the depths
Of Egypt, from the classic fields of Greece,
Her groves, her temples—All things that inspire
Wonder, delight,—who would not say the forms
Most perfect, most divine, had by consent
Flocked thither to abide eternally
Within those silent chambers where they dwell
In happy intercourse."

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

YOUNG FOLKS.

Two of Them.

BY JULIA M. LIPPMANN.

Four small shoes with copper tips,
Two big drums and two small whips,
Two bright heads with golden curls—
"Cut 'em off! they're like a girl's."

Cake must be enough for two,
One big piece would never do;
Two milk-cups and two high-chairs—
Everything must go in pairs.

Lots of noise with big toy drums,
Two loud shouts when papa comes,
Two small heads at mamma's knee,—
Twins are tired as can be.

Barbara's Lesson.

"Barbara!" The little rosy-cheeked owner of that name was lying on the lounge in the sitting-room, very much interested in reading "Dotty Dimple."

"I s'pose grandpa's left his cane most likely," she said to herself. "It seems as if he is the most forgetfullest man I ever saw. I most believe he hides his hat and cane when he comes in so's to have me hunt 'em up. Maybe he don't, but it seems so."

"Barbara!" called again grandapa's quivering voice.

"I'm coming," said Barbara, just to quiet her conscience, for she knew very well grandpa could not hear her.

"I just want to finish this chapter, and besides, grandma thinks you go out too much," added the naughty girl to herself.

Then she went on with her reading, but she did not enjoy it any more, so she put it away, and went to see what was wanted of her.

"Grandpa called you to go down to the store with him," said grandma. "He wanted some pep'mint drops for his cold, but he's so forgetful I don't like to trust him alone, and I had to let him take a ten-dollar bill because wasn't any change. I do hope he won't loose it! You didn't hear him call, did you, Barbara?"

"I—O grandma, just see that robin in the plum-tree! And here comes grandpa all right!"

"I don't know," said Grandma Grey, going to the door. "He looks as if he was troubled, or something."

"O Grandpa," faltered Barbara, "what is the matter?"

"You havn't lost the money, I hope," added grandma, anxiously.

But the old man did not answer. He dropped down on the nearest chair, and began to turn his pockets inside out nervously. "I don't know, mother," he said, with a hopeless look. "I'm afraid—I can't seem to remember, but I'm pretty sure I put it in my pocket when I paid for the things. Yes, I'm pretty sure, but 'tisn't here."

"Well," said grandma, wiping her eyes on her apron, "you are too old to go to the store alone. I don't know how we can spare the money, but there will be some way. Don't feel bad, father. We don't need many things," and the dear old lady smiled through her tears, and took up her knitting.

Poor Barbara! She felt as if she could never be happy again. For notwithstanding her heedless ways, she had a tender heart, and dearly loved her grandparents, who had taken her, a feeble baby, from her dying mother's arms, and had been to her all that father and mother could be.

How much she owed them.

She knew very well the ten dollar bill could not be spared without sacrifice.

She slipped quietly out of the house, and went down the village street, looking carefully as she went; but she saw nothing of the money, and her heart grew heavier every moment, and the hot tears dropped on the bright leaves at her feet. She reached the grocery where grandpa went to trade, and went in, asking, in a trembling tone,—

"O Mr. Cummings, did Grandpa Grey"—

Before she could finish her question, the grocer answered, "Yes, he left his change on the counter, and he got out of sight before I could call him. Here it is, Barbarba, but he is too old—your grandpa is—to go about alone."

"I know it; "it was all my fault," said the little girl. "I'll never let him go again. Thank you, dear Mr. Cummings, for keeping the change," and Barbara hurried home with the money held firmly in her hand and wiping the tears from her eyes, she cried,—

"It's all right, grandpa! I've got it here in my hand—don't you see? I heard you calling me all the time, too, and pretended not to hear; but I'll never in all my life be so naughty again, if you'll only forgive me."

"You are a good little girl, Barbara," said grandpa.

But Grandma Grey took off her spectacles and wiped them carefully; then she bent down and kissed the little girl's flushed, penitent face, and said, "I hope this will be a lesson to you, my dear child, for grandpa and grandma are growing old, and you will have to take care of them now."

One Way to Be Happy.

Most boys and girls think that if they could only have everything they wanted to wear, to amuse them, they would never be cross or dissatisfied. That is a mistaken idea. Things outside of yourself do not make happiness. I knew a boy once, about nine years old, who it seemed had everything that could make a boy happy—a lovely home, a papa and a mamma who did everything in the world to make him happy. He had a printing-press, a velocipede, a bicycle, sled, skates (ice and roller), books—everything; and yet he was the most unhappy child I ever saw. One winter morning the streets were covered with snow. All the boys in the neighborhood were out with their sleds, shouting and laughing and having the best kind of times. This boy went about the house frowning, growling, and whining. What about, do you think? He was not satisfied because his sled was not longer, and utterly refused to go out. He "would not go out with such a mean sled," he said. That afternoon I was walking not far from this boy's house when I heard shouts of laughter from some children who were out of sight around the corner. When I did see them I stood perfectly still. There were four little children without overshoes, or overcoats, or mittens. They had an old broom and two older boys were pulling him along by the handle. The forth child, a girl, was running along holding the little one on the broom. Their eyes were shining, cheeks just like roses, and they certainly were just as happy as though they had the most beautiful of sleds.

The following conversation was overheard among some little children:

Three tiny, ragged boys were playing together in the sunshine Thursday on a sidewalk near one of the North End railway stations. A fourth youngster came up, his eyes glistening with pleasure, his dirty face proud with delight. "Oh, boys," he cried, "I've foun' a tin-cint piece."

The others crowded around and discussed the treasure excitedly. Then they sat down on the curbstone to compare reminiscences of recent lucky finds.

"I foun' mos' a hull piece of a top, yesterday," said one. "I foun' a big bone in our alley, a n'orful big bone," said a second, "n' I'm goin' to make a jumper out of it."

The youngest child—the very dirtiest, smallest, thinnest baby that ever walked—had listened with a smile of perfect content, and now he chimed in, in a tone whose joy and pride no words can convey:

"Thith mornin' I foun' a peanut."

You see, it is not what you have, what you find, that makes you happy, but the use you make of it. If you use it to enjoy it, get all the pleasure and profit there is in it out of it, you will be happy in its possession; but if you think all the time that you want the thing you have not got, or cannot have, you lose all the pleasure locked up in your present possession. You know Paul said, "I have learned in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content." Now that is a text for you to think about. Paul meant that he had learned how to use the present time, the present gifts, the present friends; that it was not wise to keep grasping all the time for something out of reach. Think about it.

The Lion and the Mouse.

A lion was sleeping in his lair, when a mouse, not knowing where he was going, ran over the mighty beast's nose, and awakened him. The lion clapped his paw upon the frightened little creature, and was about to make an end of him in a minute.

Then the mouse in a tone of pity besought him to spare one who had so thoughtlessly offended, and not stain his honorable paws with so trifling a prey. The lion smiling at the little prisoner's fright, generously let him go.

Now, it so happened, not long after, that the lion, while ranging the woods for his prey fell into the toils of the hunters; and finding himself entangled, without hope of escape, set up a roar that filled the whole forest with its echo.

The mouse, hearing the voice of his former preserver, ran to the spot; and without more ado, set to work to nibble the knot in the cord that bound the lion. In a short time he set the noble beast free, convincing him that kindness is seldom thrown away.

Patience may be bitter, but the fruit will be sweet.

HOUSEHOLD.

Housekeeping.

For good housekeeping there are two requisites as absolutely essential as money, and without which this end cannot be accomplished, namely, knowledge and method. At first glance, especially to the young and inexperienced, it may seem that good housekeeping is not a difficult matter, granted a sufficient allowance of money, strength and time, but in this they are sadly mistaken. Cooking and washing, sweeping and dusting, these are simple enough they exclaim, but I will venture to say that the simplest of these is seldom done properly, because done without knowledge. In the matter of sweeping and dusting, for example, how few do it properly. The department of cooking is the most important and intricate connected with good housekeeping, yet it is not the housewife who, with the knowledge of the greatest number of recipes, and access to a large variety of materials, can get up with deliberation an elaborate meal, who is the good housekeeper, but it is she, who on an emergency, say the arrival of unexpected guests, with the ordinary means at hand, such as poultry, eggs, milk, butter, flour, spices and herbs, can prepare a savory and inviting meal.

We all know, who have lived in the country, that the butcher does not come every day in the week, nor every other day even, and we have all noticed that guests from the city expect more in the country than they do in the town, being under the impression, evidently, that even dainty dishes, like the fruits, grow on the trees; and we can readily see, therefore, that it takes more knowledge to be a good housekeeper in the country than in the town, where there are handy stores to run to for all sorts of fresh meats and made up delicacies in which the larder may be deficient. It behooves the country housewife then to study ways and means not only for emergencies, but to make her home attractive for her children, herself, and those who go out into the field or the workshop to bear the burdens of the day. Having knowledge, the next almost equally important acquisition must be method in using that knowledge, for no household can be serenely happy in which the duties are performed irregularly and without good cheer. And this latter expression brings with it a suggestion. I can see no reason why the cooking should perpetually be relegated to one individual, unless that person prefers the occupation to all others; nor why there should not be a change about in sweeping, dishwashing, washing and ironing, cooking and churning, thus making each member of the family thorough in many ways instead of being excellent in only one. A change about would be conducive to relieving the weariness of monotony complained of by so many workers, who tire of this branch or that branch in which they are always engaged. Nor need it in any wise interfere with method, because the change about should be as methodical in its regularity as the washing and ironing, or any other branch of work. This, of course, could apply only to where there is a large family of daughters or other female relatives, their numbers increasing work and tedium without such change and division of labor. By a systematic change of occupation, and method in carrying it out, country housekeepers especially will find they can have time not only for homely needlework, but for the dainty and more interesting branches of work by which they can make their homes pleasing and attractive to their fathers, sons and brothers after the toils of the day. Books on cooking and housekeeping and fancywork are excellent in their way, and much can be gleaned from them, but of necessity they go only from cover to cover, and one has to wait for a new book for new recipes and suggestions. It is the purpose of this department to select the best, and as far as possible to avoid recipes that are of little practical use to its readers; to give information from time to time of new dishes or old that will meet the exigencies of special occasions. Suggestions in certain portions of the department will be given on other subjects connected with housekeeping, such, for example, as the selection and laying of carpets; the buying of curtains and furniture; the healthful arrangement of bedrooms; the treatment of beds and bedding; etc. In addition to cooking proper, an important feature in housekeeping is wholesome canning of fruits, and drying of fruits, for which special knowledge is required to attain good results. From time to time as required or requested, this journal will be prepared to give all kinds of household receipts, not readily attained in the country, and the knowledge of which is the saving of money.

Practical Recipes.

The following recipes have been chosen with a special view to utilizing the materials ordinarily at hand in country houses:

CREAMED PARSNIPS.—Boil tender, scrape, and slice lengthwise. Put over the fire with two tablespoons of butter, pepper and salt, and a little minced parsley. Shake until the mixture boils. Dish the parsnips, add to the sauce three tablespoons of cream in which has been stirred a quarter spoonful of flour. Boil once, and pour over the parsnips.

POTATO CROQUETTES.—Pare, boil, and mash smoothly about six good-sized potatoes. Add one tablespoon of butter, two-thirds of a cupful of hot rich milk or cream, the whites of two eggs well beaten, salt and pepper to taste. When cool enough to handle work into shape, roll in egg and bread crumbs, and fry in nice, wholesome hot lard.

BEETS.—Clean these nicely, but do not pare them, leaving on a short piece of the stalk to retain the coloring and sweet juices of the vegetable. Young beets will cook tender in an hour; old beets require several hours' boiling. When done, skin quickly while hot, slice into your vegetable dish, put on salt, pepper and a little butter, and they are then ready for the table.

PARSNIPS FRIED IN BUTTER.—Scrape the parsnips and boil gently forty-five minutes. When cold, cut in long slices about one-third of an inch thick. Season with salt and pepper. Dip into melted butter and then into flour. Have two tablespoons of butter in the frying pan, and as soon as hot, put in enough parsnips to cover the bottom. Fry brown on both sides, and serve on a hot dish.

TO ROAST A GOOSE.—Having drawn and singed the goose, wipe out the inside with a clean white cloth, and sprinkle in some pepper and salt. Make a stuffing of four good-sized onions, minced fine, and half their quantity of green sage leaves, minced also, a large teacupful of grated bread crumbs, a piece of butter the size of a walnut, and the beaten yolks of two eggs, with a little pepper and salt. Mix the whole together and incorporate them well. Put the stuffing into the goose, and press it in hard, but do not entirely fill up the cavity, as the mixture will swell in cooking. Tie the goose securely round with a greased or wetted string, and paper the breast to prevent its scorching. The fire must be brisk and well kept up. It will require from two hours to two and a half to roast. Baste it at first with a little salt and water, and then with its own gravy. Take off the paper when the goose is half done, and dredge it with a little flour toward the last. Having parboiled the liver and the heart, chop them and put them into the gravy, which must be skimmed well and thickened with a little browned flour. Send apple sauce to table with the goose, also mashed potatoes. It is well to parboil a goose before roasting, as it makes it more delicate, especially if the bird is not very young. An old goose is very tough and not fit for roasting.

At St. John, N. B., recently Jennie Golden disappeared as suddenly and completely as though the earth had swallowed her. She is fourteen years old, and her mother keeps a grocery store. One morning she sent the girl, who is bright and intelligent, on three errands. The first two were performed all right, and in the third house, Mrs. Maxwell's, the girl stopped to play with the children there. She seemed gloomy and abstracted. She left there, and has not been seen or heard of since that time.

The other evening, the police found a man named John Hill lying on the floor of a shanty in Winnipeg, in an unconscious condition. An empty whiskey flask lay beside him, and he was terribly frozen. He was taken to the hospital, where he died within half an hour. The deceased had a homestead near Beausejour, but had been working as a laborer in the city for some time. It is said he formerly kept an hotel in Strathroy, Ont. He was a man of about 35 years of age, and so far as known, had no relatives in the country.

Martin, at Fletcher, imbibed freely of the contents of a whiskey jug at Tilbury Centre, and started for the boarding house of the gang, but had only proceeded 25 yards when he dropped unconscious, dying short a time afterwards. Coroners Bray and Tye were notified, and a jury consisting of six white and colored citizens empanelled. A verdict of death from excessive drinking was returned. Deceased was 22 years of age, and his friends reside in North Buxton. He was to have been married the day following that on which he met his death.

George W. Anning and Maria Anning inherited a large fortune from their father, a St. John, N. B., pawnbroker. Neither ever married, and both lived miserly, meanly, and dirty all their lives. For a number of years previous to their death they never allowed a drop of water to touch their persons, except when drinking. Last summer their house was burned, and the horrible state of filth in which the couple were living was then discovered, and they were forced by the authorities to wash themselves. As a consequence the old man caught cold and died, and his sister survived him but a short time. Among their bequests are the following:—To the St. John's Firemen's Relief Fund, $6,000; to the New Brunswick Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, $3,000; to the Young Men's Christian Association, $3,000; to the Protestant Orphan Asylum, $3,000; to the St. John Free Public Library, $3,000.

A shocking accident occurred at Lake George, twenty-three miles from Fredericton, N. B., resulting in the death of Mrs. Luke Lawson, a young married woman aged 22, the mother of two children. While passing Lawson's, on his way to school. Allen Ballantyne, aged 17, was barked at by Lawson's dog. He went home, got his brother's revolver, and again proceeded on his way to school. When Lawson's was reached the dog again barked and he fired, but instead of hitting the dog the bullet crashed through a window, entered the breast, and pierced the region of the heart of Mrs. Lawson, who was looking out of the window. She threw her arms in the air and exclaimed, "My God, I'm shot." Mrs. Lawson was alone in the house and no one witnessed the deed. The boy ran into the house where she was writhing in a death agony, but was unable to render the dying woman assistance. He then ran for his mother, who soon arrived with other neighbors, only to witness the victim gasping her last breath. The tragic affair created a great sensation in the district. Ballantyne's father brought the boy to Fredericton and handed him over to the authorities and the boy was gaoled.

Austria-Hungary.

Of the two great Empires which are now confronting each other with a constant threat of war in Eastern Europe, much is known about Russia, and but little in this country about Austria-Hungary. Yet both the history and the present condition of Austria-Hungary are full of deep interest for those whose tastes lead them to enjoy the study of nations and political systems.

As the very name implies, Austria-Hungary is a dual monarchy; that is, two monarchies combined into one by a common tie. There is only one other monarchy of the sort in the world, that of Sweden and Norway, which two countries are still more distinct from each other than are Austria and Hungary, for they have no common government whatever.

Austria, that part of the Empire which lies west of the River Leitha, and Hungary, which lies east of that river, form each a kingdom entirely by itself. The chief tie between them is the fact that the same person is the sovereign of both. The Emperor of Austria is also King of Hungary, and is crowned both at Vienna, the Austrian capital, and also at Buda-Pesth, the Hungarian capital.

But otherwise each Kingdom has its separate Parliament, and its own Cabinet, or ministry. Each makes its own laws, imposes and collects its own taxes, and manages its own public affairs. In each Kingdom, too, the Cabinet is responsible to the two bodies which constitute the national legislature.

There is, however, an arrangement by which the two Kingdoms act in concert as one Empire, in regard to all matters of political moment common to them both. This arrangement consists of a body which is called the "Delegations." The Delegations are composed of sixty delegates from each Kingdom, chason by the Parliaments, who meet every year alternately at the two capitals, and deliberate upon subjects of imperial concern. Those subjects are foreign affairs, finance, and military administration.

Corresponding to the Delegations, and responsible to them, is an Imperial Cabinet which comprises only three ministers. The first of these ministers is at the head of the department of foreign affairs. The other two ministers hold the portfolios of war and finance. The power of the Imperial Government, as such, is confided, therefore, to diplomatic relations with other powers, the management of the army and the conduct of wars, and the financial measures needed for the departments.

Austria-Hungary was for many centuries a despotism as hard and as absolute as is that of Russia to-day. But twenty years ago, as a result of its overwhelming defeat by the Prussians, it became a constitutional monarchy. The Emperor ceased to be absolute; ministers were made responsible to the representatives of the people; and the people were admitted to a very large share in the control of the Government.

As a result of this happy change, the Austrain peoples were accorded liberty of speech and conscience, a free press, freedom of marriage and education, and a widely extended suffrage. An entirely new career was opened to them as one of the great nations of Europe.

Composed as the empire is, of many different, jealous, antagonistic races, of which the Germans, Magyars, Czechs and Slavs are the chief, the task of holding them together as one nation has been difficult. But the attainment of political freedom by these peoples has lessened the difficulty.

The Emperor was never so secure of his dominions when he was an absolute despot as he has been since he gave up a large portion of his power, and shared it with his subjects. The Austria-Hungarian Empire may not be long-lasting; but it is certain that it would have fallen to pieces long ago if despotism had not been abandoned, and if a free constitution had not been granted.

Cause for Thankfulness.

A country parson, in encountering a storm the past season in the voyage across the Atlantic, was reminded of the following: A clergyman was so unfortunate as to be caught in a severe gale in the voyage out. The water was exceedingly rough, and the ship persistently buried her nose in the sea. The rolling was constant, and at last the good man got thoroughly frightened. He believed they were destined for a watery grave. He asked the captain if he could not have prayers. The captain took him by the arm, and led him down to the forecastle where the tars were singing and swearing. "There," he said, "when you hear them swearing, you may know there is no danger. He went back feeling better, but the storm increased his alarm. Disconsolate and unassisted, he managed to get to the forecastle again. The ancient mariners were swearing as hard as ever. "Mary," he said to his sympathetic wife, as he crawled into his berth after tacking across a wet deck, "Mary, thank God they're swearing yet."

We attract hearts by the qualities we display; we retain them by the qualities we possess.

HEALTH.

The Remedies of Nature.

Many years ago an eminent English physician wrote a book entitled "Nature and Art in the Cure of Disease," in which attention was called to the important fact that in the healing of the sick, Nature does the real work, the physician aids by advice and regimen and remedies, but nature repairs the injury or removes the obstacle, and restores the sick one to health. Nature herself supplies numerous remedies which are of inestimable worth in the healing of disease as well as in the preservation of health. The value of such simples as pure air, sunshine, water, heat and cold, exercise, rubbings, diet, etc., is too often overlooked. The Scientific American has recently done its readers a service by calling attention to a series of papers on this subject by an eminent English physician, as follows:—

"Presumably it is the intention of these papers to convey important and timely information to the medical faculty; they furnish at the same time a hint to the patient at large, which, if he be wise, he will hasten to avail himself of. Perhaps it is the author's intention that he should, for at one moment he seems to drop his voice to a whisper while admonishing the fraternity that they must stop dosing and drugging, and at another, talks in stentorian tones over their heads, warning the public to look to nature rather than to art for relief from all the minor ailments to which humanity is heir. It may, perhaps be a disappointment to those who have come to lean upon their medical adviser for advice and rely upon him for health, to learn that the effects of fresh air are more potent and enduring than artificial stimuli, and exercise more to be depended on than jalap, attenuations of aconite and belladonna, or even bread pills. He inveighs against the practice, now unhappily prevalent, of attacking the effects, or outward signs, of a disease instead of the cause, or seat, of the malady—a practice which sometimes proceeds from ignorance, though it is often adapted to allay the fears of the patient. 'A swelling suddenly appears on a man's knee, whereat,' says the author, 'he flies in alarm to his physician. The latter sets himself diligently to work to remove the swelling, and, to the joy of his patient, succeeds.' 'This,' he says, 'is like stopping the alarm bells which tell us that a fire has broken out. We should be attending to the fire and let the bells ring.'"

While we may not endorse every line of the above, the truth and good sense which it contains, commends the opinions expressed, to all intelligent persons. The present is an era of progress, and the visible gain in methods of treating disease promises for the future still greater advances in this direction.

Newspaper Talk about Health.

It is a good omen for any good cause when the newspapers, which are generally devoted to the animadversions and party scheming of politics, undertake to champion the cause of any good reform. It shows a general waking up to the importance of what reformers have been preaching about, almost unheeded, perhaps, for a generation previous. Here are some good thoughts impressively stated, from a contemporary.

"It used to be considered fashionable to take no exercise; and the prevailing custom of little, cramping shoes, too short for the foot, and further incumbered with a French heel set in the centre of the sole, helped out the fancy. Very delicate young women who could not walk a mile without groaning, were typical beauties. Now girls learn to row with their brothers, tramp with their fathers, and are quite as fond of the gymnasium as are their masculine admirers. Eighteen inches about the belt is no longer desirable, nor is pallor indicative of good breeding. It is certainly true that we owe our children a culture of the body as well as of the brain. A little fellow with spindling limbs may have his muscles judiciously developed; a little maid with crooked shoulders may become as straight and symmetrical as her neighbor if her parents will attend to her in time. If a mother should permit a girl to reach the age of maturity without learning to read, we would blame her excessively; yet we condone the offense which permits bad teeth, bent shoulders, and sallow skin. In all cases there is a pure tablet upon which to write the record of care.

"There is no doubt about the importance of physical culture. The hair, the teeth, the eyes, and the skin are subject to the influences of digestion, and is not the latter to be almost controlled by the diet, bathing, and fresh air? People go all the year with the pores of their skin clogged, and they rave over the benefit to be obtained at the water-cure, simply because they do there what they neglect at home—bathe regularly, systematically, and particularly. It is, of course, absurd to prescribe certain baths as infallible cure-alls. What will do for a robust person will kill a frail one; but the general rule of frequent and judicious bathing may be laid down. Then comes the fresh air craze. The windows of a house should be numerous and opposite, and there should be patches of God's sunlight on the floor instead of the æsthetic gloom so depressing to the young, who are to be carefully trained. The writer would urge gymnastic exercises ahead of Greek and Latin, and a romp in the green fields before any number of volumes of lore. Let the young people drink in the blessings of health all around us and about us and within reach.

"Last week the writer overheard a very much dressed damsel conversing on the street corner with a youth. 'I scarcely know what it is to walk,' she said, 'and I do so dislike exercise.' The close observer took in the cramped features, the heavily powdered skin, with the sallow color looking through, observed the tightly drawn face veil which pinned down the eye-lashes, and shuddered as the eye fell on the pinched waist and narrow shoulders; and this passed for good looks! A girl need not be coarse to be vigorous, nor masculine to have muscles. Her shoulders should be thrown back, her eye keen, and her color good. It is a crime to lose one's teeth at forty, a disgrace to have constant headache at twenty, and indigestion is no more a part of her earthly [illegible] than small-pox. Go to any lunch party, and watch the delicate women tax their [illegible], and yet they wonder why [illegible], we may inherit certain organic troubles from indiscreet ancestors; such is the inconvenience of entailment; but we can stop further transmission. Bad breath ought to be looked on as worse than soiled hands, and yet you would scarcely excuse a lady the latter attachment."

Boys.

Two English teachers were in conversation, and, of course, they were talking of their experiences in school. One was an old man, who, besides having served as mathematical master at Eton for thirty years, had been for another long period master of a great school at Windsor. The other was a much younger man, though at the head of an important institution.

The younger man said, "I shall not live to be as old as you are. The boys will kill me before I reach your age."

The old man replied, "It is the boys who keep me alive."

One of these teachers enjoyed what worried and exhausted the other, and any one who remembers his school-life can give a pretty good guess at the reason. In a school of a hundred boys, at least ninety are usually so well-disposed that they give little wearing trouble to a faithful and intelligent teacher. The distress and exhaustion are caused by the remaining ten, some of whom are stupid, others careless, others merely nervous and restless, and, perhaps, two or three really depraved.

The art of governing a school consists chiefly in knowing what to do with the lower ten, and it is just that part of the art which is least capable of being communicated. Every boy is a new case, requiring special study and peculiar treatment. Yet it is the ninety good boys who can most readily influence the others. Not long ago four or five of the lower ten were engaged in the mean sport of making fun of a poor old woman who lost her mind many years ago by the sudden loss of her children. She was a harmless, good creature, who went about chattering words without meaning, and these thoughtless, cruel boys were pulling her dress and laughing at her.

One of the upper ninety came along. He did nothing violent, nor did he indulge in indignant speech. He merely said "Fellows, it is mean to treat this old woman so." That was all, and it was enough They desisted, and the poor woman went her way in peace.

When the ninety act in that manner throughout, the ten will not kill their teachers, and they themselves will probably escape hanging. The worst boy dare not face the public opinion of his school, if it is expressed so that he knows what it is.

Difficult Queries.

The wisest man may easily be puzzled by the questions of a child, and when any person exerts himself to coin out-of-the-way queries, there is no height of impracticability which he may not reach. Many questions were forwarded to the London Universal Information Bureau lately, in a competition to see who could propound the most perfect poser. It would be hard to say which of the jokers succeeded best, among those who sent in the following:—

What is the name of the oldest inhabitant of Pekin?

How many trees has Mr. Gladstone felled in his life?

How many paving-stones are there in the city of London?

Please tell me the depth in the deepest place of the sand in the Great Sahara Desert?

How many panes of glass are there in windows in the whole of London?

Who was William the Conqueror's first boot-maker?

What is the degree of relationship between Mr. Gladstone and Cain or Abel?

How many honest men are there in the city of London?

How many stones have been thrown into the Serpentine River in Hyde Park, this year, by boys and by girls?

What was the price charged for the first glass of ale publicly sold by the first licensed victualler granted a license in England?

Explain the origin of evil.

Where are the bones of the late Gen. Gordon, the hero of Khartoum? !

How many milestones are there on the "Road to Ruin"?

Who was Pontius Pilate's great-grandmother's washing-woman?

Where do all the gins go to?

Are there any shell-fish at the scource of the river Congo?

One questioner asks, "Who made the first shirt?" calmly adding, "A simple question, but I don't believe it can be answered."

For Parents.

The mistake of many earnest reformers has been in attempting to put the State in the place of the parent—society in the province of home. It has been thought more rational to limit liquor-selling than to so train boys that they would not want liquor—a better philosophy to curb the supply than to kill the demand.

For example, farm life has been in general left so rude and barren that the young have sought their vocation elsewhere, in the midst of temptations. Home life in towns has been too often conducted without reference to the innate and innocent desire of folks for recreation, and the boys have drifted out upon the streets and into taverns and bad companionship, when they might and should have been finding their enjoyment at home. Too busy fathers and too weary mothers, and too careless sisters are the ruin of many a promising lad. "You must not!" from the father, and "You ought not!" from the mother, have been relied on to keep him from evil ways, while he was left to himself for entertainment. And so, instead of playing with his sister or with his father at home, the boy has played over a mug of beer with some mates after the shop was shut up.

Most lads would prefer a cosy sitting room at home, where they were at liberty to bring their companions for innocent games or cheerful music, to a rendezvous in a tavern. But with a home that is all command and no concessions, all preaching and no pleasure, all duty and no fun—a dull, tread-mill, old-folks sort of place—it is a matter for deep regret, but not of wonderment, that the boys drift away from it. Keep hold of your children if you would save them, parents. And remember that the real forces are those of love, expressed not in care merely, but in sympathy, co-operation, participation and real companionship.

"In Mitigation."

The Laird of B——, having given his coachman notice to quit for having overturned the carriage coming home from a dinner party, was waited on by the defaulter next morning. He admitted his offence, but in mitigation said, "I wasna sae very drunk, and gentlemen, ye ken, whyles get drunk." "Weel," was the reply, "I dinna say ye were very drunk for a coachman, sae aff ye go."

WHAT TRUE MERIT WILL DO.
The unprecedented sale of Boschee's German Syrup within a few years, has astonished the world. It is without doubt the safest and best remedy ever discovered for the speedy and effectual cure of Coughs, Colds and the severest Lung troubles. It acts in an entirely different principle from the usual prescriptions given by Physicians, as it does not dry up the Cough and leave thee diseas still in the system, but on the contrary removes the cause of the trouble, heals the part affected and leaves them in a purely healthy condition. A bottle kept in the house for use when the disease make their appearance, will save doctor's bills and a long spell of serious illness. A trial will convince you of these facts. It is positively sold by all druggists and general in the land. Price, 75 cts., large bottles. E. O. W.

Rev. S, J. Hunter pointed out at a meeting held in Hamilton recently that Canada spends $27,000,000, per annum for liquor and 400,000 per annum in support of missions. These are figures which should arouse Christian men to the enormity of the drink abuse.

Leg Broken.—On Friday last Mr. Thos. Mathews, Harness Maker of this town, happened with the sad misfortune of getting his leg broken. Mr. Rand the horse buyer had a horse market that day and a number of men and horses were in the Markdale House yard, and as Mr. Mathews passed a farmers team one of them kicked him breaking both bones below the knee. Drs. Sproule & Brodie set the limb and the patient is doing as well as can be expected.

The year 1887, the year of the Queen's jubilee, is to be signalized by the issue of the greatest illustrated paper ever issued in America—the Carnival number of the Montreal Star—a work of national importance. We are told by those who know that it will overshadow and outstrip all previous efforts in illustrated journalism. Those who cannot go to Montreal for the great Carnival will find all the events to the very life in the Carnival number of the Star. It is to be some forty odd mammoth pages with five plate supplements.

Sudden Death.—James Gawley of Holland, near Berkeley was taken with inflamation of the lungs on Saturday the 15th inst and notwithstanding the attendance of two physicians he gradually sank until the following Thursday night when death ended his sufferings. Deceased was a strong healthy industrious and highly respected young man of 31 years. He was a member of the Orange body and was buried by his brethern on Saturday last.

Lawyer's Office Exhlosion.—It wasn't the office which exploded, neither was it the Lawyer, but a lamp which stood on the table amongst divers papers books etc., in McCullough's law office in McFarland's block on Friday evening last. Mr. McCullough was out at the time, but the fire was seen through the window from Turner's Drug Store, from which willing hands rushed to the rescue of the building and soon got the fire under control, not however before the table cover and room carpet were destroyed. Mr. McCullough had his hands blistered in the fray, but not seriously burned. Had the fire got a few minutes more headway it would have been one of the most destructive in the history of the village.

The Masqnerade Carnival at the Roller Rink on Friday night last was a grand success, notwithstanding the bad state of the roads. The masqueraders were numerous and their various costumes made the scene brilliant, fantastical and weird. The ladies were beautiful in their lovely costumes, and the men were fine stalwart specimens of young canadian manhood. The prizes awarded by the judges—Messrs P. McCullough, Thos. McNea and Will Taylor—to the successful competitors were as follows:—Best lady and gent skater Silas Hill and Mabel Mathews: Best dressed lady in costume, Miss. McNea; Fastest gent skater, Rudd Mathews; Best dressed gent in costume, Alex McDuff; Fastest boy skater, Arthur Askin; Best clown, W. Ford; Fat man, Fred Dundas; Best looking lady, Miss. Allie Fish; Best lean Man, W. Smith, Holland Centre; best lady skater, Mabel Mathews; Best Indian costume, Mr. Strain, Flesherton; best costume girl under 15, Miss Meedie McNea; best costumed boy under 15, John Dundas; best lady Highland costume Miss McDuff; Judge McCullough announced the prizes. and being in his happiest mood, mounted a coal oil barrel, lowered his spectacles to the point of his nose, thrust his thumbs in the lapel of his vest, expanded his chest already swelling with long pent up oratory, and greatly amused the large audience with a witty little speech. The Band under the new leadership of Mr. Wm. Mason played unusually well, and from its maiden effort under his able leadership we predict for it a higher degree of efficiency in future. There will be another carnival about the last of February, and the Rink will be opened during the remainder of the season on Tuesday and Friday nights.

I WONDER.

If the three Grey's will repeat their recent verdict.

If the two Young Liberal Club's are any benefit to their respective parties.

Or even to themselves.

If the new Village Police have been sworn in.

Or if they have had a meeting of the board.

If they intend taking up the incorporation question.

If they could perform an act that would be as great a benefit to the town.

If more public spirit and enterprise on the part of our leading business men would not be profitable individually as well as collectively.

If Ministers of the Gospel should be above criticism.

If the actions of any public men or body of men may not be criticised with profit to all concerned.

If there is anything more difficult to criticise through the press than the local paper.

Or that needs it more.

The reduction of internal revenue and the taking off of revenue stamps from Proprietary Medicine, no doubt has largely benefitted the consumers, as well as relieving the burden of home manufactures. Especially is this the case with Green's August Flower and Boschee's German Syrup as the reduction of twenty six cents per dozen, has been added to increase the size of the bottle containing these remedies, thereby giving one-fifth more medicine in the 75 cent size, The August Flower for Dyspepsia and Liver Complaint and the German Syrup for Cough and Lung troubles, have perhaps, the largest sale of any medicine in the world. The advantage of increased size of the bottle will be greatly appreciated by the sick and afflicted, in every town and of village civilized countries. Sample bottles for 10 cents remain the same size. E. O. W.

A TALE OF SOCIAL LIFE IN CANADA.

BY W. E. BESSEY, M. D.

PART IV.—(CONCLUDED.)

"Here are the evidences of the mighty genius of a Raphael and a Michael Angelo. In the Vatican I saw Raphael's 'Dispute on the Holy Sacraments,' his 'Philosophy or School of Athens,' his 'Annunciation' and his two great masterpieces, 'The Transfiguration' and the 'Madonna da Foliguo.' Murrilo's 'Return of the Prodigal Son' and Dorenichi's 'Communion of St. Jerome' are grand beyond description. The Vatican contains the finest paintings and sculptures in the world. Among the environs of Rome the Via Appia is interesting; and to you the gardens of Italy,—specially Florence, would be entrancing in their beauty. There the variety, richness of color, and perfection of the flowers, would give you something to rave about for the rest of your life, to say nothing of its sunny clime, clear skies and beautiful scenery. But I think I may safely say that two pieces of sculpture, of which excellent copies are not unfrequently seen, have always been very suggestive to my mind, and have pleased me most. One seems to me to represent the woman of the past and present; the other the woman of the future. Whoever looks at the bust of Clyte will recognize in it a beautiful idealization of the 'clinging vine' type of woman; tender, timid, gentle and graceful, but weak; a pretty ornament, an endearing pet, but not an entertaining or a helpful companion. A man might like to have such a wife, as he would like some rare and delicate flower in his garden. To a certain extent she might be company for him, as is a faithful dog that looks into his eyes to be guided by every wish expressed there; but if he wants any interchange of thought, any sympathy in his pursuits, any helpful suggestions in an hour of trouble, he must seek them elsewhere. Classical fable tells us that Clyte was enamored of Appolo, and was metamorphosed into a sunflower, which continually turns toward that brilliant god. In the sculptured bust the petals of the coming sunflower are already seen forming around her. The moral significance, though not intended, is very instructive; for if a woman continually turns to a lord and master for guidance, the natural consequence is that hers should become a vegetable existence.

"Of all the sculpture I have ever seen most I admire the Venus of Milo. I never cease to wonder how so much life and character could be expressed in such a colorless, hard substance as marble. There seems to be a soul within the stone, shining through it, as does a lighted lamp within a transparent shrine. A friend to whom I gave an admirable bust of this noble statue said to me soon afterward: 'You have spoiled my Clyte. I used to think her so lovely and graceful! But the Venus of Milo kills her. I have been obliged to put her away in a distant corner so that she might not be extinguished by the comparison.' That remark was prophetic.' The true nobility of the Woman of the Past, the much-praised 'clinging-vine' type of womanhood will be laid away in a corner, it cannot stand comparison with

'The perfect woman, nobly planned,
To warn, to comfort, and command.'"

"Oh, you must be in love; you are always raving about woman! perfect woman! As if there was ever any such thing."

"Well," said Bentley, I will tell you a story from the ancient classics that forms a parallel in your own experience, in your own short, but eventful life. It is often on my mind, for, like Psyche, it seems that after much suffering you are to be united by God Himself to your believer Cupid, that is me of course. Ha, ha:—Well, there was a certain king named Apulcius, who had three daughters, of whom the youngest, Psyche, was a marvel of beauty, and altars were consecreated to her that properly belonged to Venus. The anger of the jealous goddess was excited, and she commanded her son Cupid to inspire Psyche with a passion for some frightful monster, but Cupid himself fell in love with her, and he bore her away to a delightful place, where she was visited every night by the young god, who left her at early dawn. Her sisters persuaded her that he who came in the darkness of night and whom she had never seen, must be some loathsome monster, and they urged her to destroy him while he slept; but when she brought a lamp, and beheld his matchless beauty, her joy deprived her of the power of motion, and in her agitation she let fall from her lamp a drop of the hot oil upon his shoulder, which awoke him. With a few words of reproach, he fled. Psyche now endeavored to destroy herself, but nothing in nature would injure her. At length, through the contrivance of Venus, she fell under the influence of sleep, brought especially from the infernal world. From this sleep she was not aroused until Cupid came and touched her with the point of one of his arrows, when she arose, and became sufficiently purified through suffering, she was endowed with wings, and united by Jove himself to her beloved Cupid."

"Well, dear," ventured Bently, "May we not hope to see the world yet together?"

"Oh, well," she replied, "I am so much afraid to hope. My life has been so blighted, and my most reasonable hopes frustrated in the past that now I feel quite subdued, and willing simply to lie in the lap of God, there to be nursed back to hope, and he fills my whole heart with joy; but it is the joy I have from communing with Nature, and if I tell you how much I adore Nature as it is beautifully expressed in Massey's sweet lines, and remember that line of Burns—which tells that man is above nature, you will be able to infer how precious you have grown to me. Nothing, however, in this world is half so much to be admired as a true and honorable man. Some one has truly said, 'An honorable man is the noblest work of God.'"

"Do you think so?" said Mr. Bently; "so do we business men; but the idea is getting abroad that the sharpest man is God's master-piece of Creation. Talents are lauded above character, but while one is fuel, like turpentine, for a brilliant blaze, the other, like solid coal, lasts longer, and proves most profitable to the possessor. Every man is a volume if you know how to read him."

"Ah, yes," replied Ruth, "I knew a lady once who fell into a sad mistake by preferring brilliant meteoric talents to fair business abilities, and unquestioned probity of character. By it she blighted her own early life, saddened the home of her parents, suffered untold wrongs, and humiliation, and in her efforts to rescue the man whose name she bore from a prison, the just consequence of his evil deeds, she nearly perished from exposure, and fatigue. Happily death proved to her a glad evangel, and then with heart swelling with thankfulness and gratitude; she finds herself again offered the hand and heart of the same worthy man of character and position, in wedlock, and this time, by the grace of God she intends to heed her father's admonition, and accept the proffered blessing; believing that it is a direct interposition of Divine Providence that has brought it all about."

"That was a very happy termination, truly," answered Mr. Bently. "It is not given to all to live to correct the mistakes of youth. How much many would give to have their lives to live over again; how few would marry the partner they did, how many would only repeat the mistakes of the past. I think nothing in this world so much to be admired as a happily mated married couple, where the home is a hive of industry, frugality and love."

"I agree with the sentiment," said Ruth, "and see no reason why there should be so much misery, and sorrow as the result of mismating. We make our own skies very largely. Our hearts cast their shadows without us, and the projections of these shadows tinge the world. We find on this earth, in a measure, whatever we bring the eyes to see. A joyous heart finds much joy in any circumstances and experiences. A gloomy heart finds no end of gloom. A songful spirit hears music everywhere; but a life that has no music in itself never hears a songful note, even amid the sweetest and richest of harmonies."

"You love Nature, and make bright skies around you generally do you not?" said Mr. Bently. "Such lansdcapes as that yonder with valley and stream, village and church-spire, glittering in the sunbeam, well cultivated fields, herds grazing quietly in the meadows, and yonder in the distance, toward La Prairie, a steamer glides proudly along as if conscious of having done a clever thing in successfully shooting the rapids of Lachine above yonder, and those volcanic peaks in the horizon yonder that tell of past ages of upheavals and smoking craters, long since ceased to belch forth their fiery breath and smoke and lava."

"Yes, I love nature, and I revel in its lesson on every leaf; on every tiny flower, or blade of grass, Creator, God, is written. But don't think me a crank devoted to the modern feministic idea of higher education; for much as I love to while away an hour among the fields, flowers, insects and birds each of them teems with inspiration to the thoughtful mind. I am no modern Amazon who prefers to desert the quiet pursuits of domestic life or woman's most holy office of wife and mother for the country-house or school-room, the lecture-hall, or rostrum. No, Herbert Spencer, your philosophy may enchant the while but cannot make me forget the privilege with which I have been endowed by beingborn a woman in this progressive era, in this beloved Canada of ours, the land of the free; and a true woman should ever be man's faithful friend and counsellor."

"These are noble sentiments, Ruth. I have no misgivings. You will be all the world to me, I am sure, and a noble woman when you have the opportunities it will be in my power to place at your disposal."

"How kind of you to suggest that," she replied. "Since I have come to know you well, I am more and more impressed with the dignity of man, and the dependence of woman. And how grateful we should be to God for so arranging matters, that we women may be a necessity to and always ministering, in various ways, to his happiness and well-being, for 'Woman is man's attendant angel, a ministering spirit she.'"

"You have a high ideal, I fear," said Mr. Bently, "and I would warn you not to expect too much in me; for I am only a plain business man, not brilliant, or poetic, but I hope, honest, honorable and industrious, and of a disposition easily to be entreated."

"Yes," she replied, "but my ideal is not an extravagant impossible fantasy of the mind, but in your own dear self, a living, acting reality, and you answer to the picture Blanchard has drawn,—his sentiments are mine.

"Yes, I agree with the sentiments of the poem, but not with the application you make of it. You are too complimentary. I shall fall short of your ideal, and you will reproach me, or speak disparagingly of me to your friends; then, instead of being a fixed star in your firmament, I shall have become a falling one."

"Speak disparagingly of you! No, never? Why should I?" she said, "Even had I some slight occasion, no true wife could speak thus of her husband."

"Nevertheless they sometimes do."

"Do they? Then more's the pity; for the man's cause is woman's—they rise or fall together."

"Let us change the subject," she interrupted. "Have you ever read these lines:

"Twas on a Sunday afternoon, as I lay in the shade
So very cool and grateful that the spreading willows made,
A holy calm spread o'er the scene and scarce a sound was heard
Beside the humming of a bee or warbling of a bird.
The lazy kine down in the vale, stood knee deep in the stream;
The church bells of the distant spire tolled soft as if in dream;
The earth seemed hushed to quiet rest, a trance did o'er me steal,
And while I dreamed an angel bright stood near me as if real."

"Well, that's the kind of spirit that I often find myself in here. You have spent happy days here, dear Ruth, in your beautiful home with its pleasant surroundings. Have you no misgivings about changing your lot or making another matrimonial venture? Since your estate fell into your own hands you have been beautifying Parkhill; and I hear much of your doings in promoting the work of benevolent institutions. That is a noble work, and profitable withal; 'for charity is twice blessed; it blesses him that gives as well as him that takes!'"

"Go on and prosper; you are like some beautiful spirit descended from a brighter sphere to dispense love and happiness here. But

"Come live with me and be my love;
And we will all the pleasures prove
That hills and valleys, dales and field
Woods or steepy mountains yield.
And we will sit upon the rocks
Seeing the shepherds feed their flocks;
By shallow rivers, to whose falls
Melodious birds sing madrigals.
And I will make thee beds of roses
And a thousand fragrant posies;
A cap of flowers and a kirtle
Embroidered all with leaves of myrtle."

"I have thought you might not object to become the matron of a home,—a sort of orphan asylum of your own, in which little Rosebud and I should be the inmates. We would not give much trouble, only a little naughty at times perhaps; but as in the hive all are loyal to the queen bee; so we would make you our queen, and all should yield you due allegiance, as loyal subjects should."

"'Tis kind of you to suggest so bright a picture. My mind is fully made up. Eight years ago my dear old father pleaded with me to accept you; then when I accepted from you this ring I plighted my most solemn vow to live for you alone. I shall keep my pledge and when it is your wish to have it so I will renew that pledge for life at the altar. I am resolved to let the past with its sad memories be buried and, as Longfellow says, 'Act in the living present, heart within and God o'erhead.' I have much to thank my dear father for, I shall please him by taking you for my husband. It has been the one great sorrow of his life. Now I shall redeem the past to him by marrying you. I owe much to him; by his wise forethought this property was preserved to me by an entail through which, while I enjoy its use during life, it descends by right to my child. It is a pleasant spot, is this old Parkhill to me. I have lived here in happy seclusion so long in that quaint old Hall up there; every nook and corner of which seems so full of interest. I should much regret to leave it now, if it could be avoided."

She paused for a reply; none came. Herbert was absent-minded just then.

"It was the home of the Raines, and the dear old Captain used to come over and have a game of whist with Grandpapa," she continued, "and talk over all the battles in which he had been engaged. He could tell all about the Alma, Inkermann, and the wild charge at Balacklava. 'We thought them mad when they started for those guns; he said; ,and we missed them often after.' I like this dear old spot because of the grand old soldier whose home it once was."

"Well, dear Ruth, have you decided when you will make me the happiest of men?"

"Will it make you the 'happiest of men,' dear Herbert, to make me your wife? Have you no misgivings, may I ask?"

"None," was the quick reply.

"Then you do love me, Herbert, do you not? Tell me once more the sweet story I love so well, won't you, Herbert?" she said.

"You ask me how I love you," he replied, "then as you love poetry, I will let the poet tell."

"How do I love thee? Let me count the ways:
I love thee to the depths, and breadth and height
My soul can reach, when,—feeling out of sight
For the ends of being and ideal grace.
I love thee to the level of every day's
Most quiet need; by sun and candle light.
I love thee freely as men strive for right,
I love thee purely, as they turn from praise.
I love thee with the passion put to use
In thy old griefs; and with my childhood's faith,
I love thee with a love thou ne'er shall lose.
And, by the saints! I'll love thee with the breath,
Smiles, tears of all my life! and if God choose
I shall but love thee better after death."

"Ah, Ruth, it must be plain I love thee well. Must I my suit renew, or will you name the day?"

"What woman's heart could withstand such love as yours, or resist such pleading?" she replied. "If it please thee let our nuptial day be fixed for the seventh of next month. It will be on a Wednesday and in just three weeks' time, so if odd numbers bring good luck, you will surely be a 'lucky fellow.'"

"Lucky fellow! Of course I am, my darling Ruth. You have made me a very happy fellow already. I accept your promise, and here's the seal that binds the lovers' vow," said he, as he impressed a kiss on her lips.

And so they were married,—and the little church on the hill was never more gaily decorared for any occasion; and never was it filled by a more select gathering. Never did bride look half as beautiful in her lovely womanhood, or Herbert Bently feel so proud a man as they left the church that bright summer morn, man and wife.

The day was bright, and baskets of flowers, strewn in her pathway by the girls of her Sunday School class, dressed as a troupe of flower girls, seemed a happy omen of a bright and happy future; and the old slippers and handsful of rice that flew after the stately equipage of the Bently's, as it rolled away from the Bently mansion where the wedding breakfast was given; all seemed to say, "we wish you a long, and happy, and prosperous life."

And so it has proved. Herbert Bently is a leading merchant in the city where they dwell. Ruth is the best and happiest of wives, and the mother of three more beautiful children. But Rosebud comes in for more than a fair share of Mr. Bently's attention, so careful is he that there shall be no difference made, or anything occur to pain the heart of the woman he loves so well; and whose charms he seems to appreciate more and love more fondly and tenderly as the years roll by. And so the old gypsy woman's prophecy has been fulfilled. Dame fortune has smiled on Ruth Elliott, and she has lived to realize that

"Love is not a soulless clod;
For living it shall rise
Transfigured in the light of God
And giving glory to the skies.
'Tis that which makes this life so sweet
And renders Heaven's joy complete."

Mayor Scott, of Galt, instead of following the usual practice of giving a supper to the members of the Council, donoted $50 to the poor of the town.

The by-law to grant a bonus of $10,000 to the proposed Lake Erie, Essex, and Detroit River Railway, has been carried in Kingsville by a vote of 125 to 3 or by 122 majority.

Two law students of London were committed for contempt by Mr. Justice Armour, at London, but after spending a few hours in gaol, they apologized and were released.

The Presbyterians of Greenway, in Huron County, have received permission from the Bishop of Huron to hold their Sabbath evening services in the English Church of that village.

Alexander Mitchell of Montreal, John Mather of Keewatin, and other capitalists, intend immediately building at Keewatin Falls a flour mill with a capacity of 1,000 barrels per day.

Mr. Michael Toohey, of East Oxford, has just died at the age of 109 years. He was born in Ireland, and previous to the battle of Waterloo was offered a bounty of $90 to enlist as a British soldier.

A young lady purchased a watch from a Paris jeweller not long ago, and next day brought it back to have it repaired. This she repeated several times, and finally proposed marriage to the jeweller, frightening the poor man so terribly that he took refuge in the garret until the aspirant for his hand had left the shop.

A young man named Peter Wyatt, of St. Thomas, has broken his right arm four times. The last occasion was a few days ago, when he was engaged in a friendly boxing match with gloves in the apartments of a companion. He aimed a blow at his opponent's head who ducked, and Wyatt's elbow struck the dodger's head, fracturing his arm.

Mr. T. White, of Dalton, was suffering with a sore throat, and was using as a remedy tablets of chlorate of potash, which he carried in a tin bow in his trouser's pocket. The other day this box exploded, scorching and blistering him badly, and playing havoc with his clothes. He has since changed both his medicine and his trousers.

Mr. John Drennan, of Seymour, is very ill from blood poisoning. He has been in a very feeble condition for four weeks past, and during that time he has tasted nothing but liquid food. His illness is the result of a frozen foot and exposure. Some of the flesh of the frozen foot will have to be removed.

A committee appointed at a public meeting at Vancouver, B. C., waited on a number of Chinamen who recently arrived from Victoria, and requested them to leave, which they did. Their return fare to Victoria was paid by subscriptions received from citizens. It is reported that instructions have been received to take proceedings against Mayor McLean, of Vancouver, and other citizens implicated in the expulsion.

For sometime past a well-known young lady of Belleville has been making active preparations for her marriage, which was to have been celebrated on a certain Wednesday. The trousseau had been prepared, the invitations issued, the cake delivered, and even the expected bridegroom had arrived on the scene. But at the last moment the young lady refused to go on with the ceremony. No reason has been asigned for her remarkable conduct, but it is whispered that a third person is responsible for her change of purpose.

Stipendiary Motton, of Halifax the other day sent to gaol for four months without the option of a fine five woman found in a house of ill-fame and intimated that the next time a house of bad repute was raided the male as well as the female inmates would be gaoled, and that the law would be impartially administered to male and female offenders alike. Hitherto outcast women in Halifax have escaped with a lenient fine, and this new departure by the stipendiary has created a great sensstion.

A Westville, N. S., correspondent, recounting the incidents of 1886, writes as follows:—"Early in the year we had a middle-aged lady elope with a young man; later on we had a septuagenarian bigamist—John Sparks—who now stands behind the bars at Halifax awaiting the decision of the powers that be. To close this line for 1886, there was united together last night a young bride of 16 years, to a groom of about 26. The bride is good looking, smart and intelligent. The groom is stone blind, with only one arm, and to the best of our knowledge has never seen nor will see his young bride."

Dr. Dufresne says that he has just received the clear title deed of the handsome residence erected by Hugh Sutherland on Armstrong's Point at a cost of $50,000. Two years ago it was offered at a tax sale. The doctor was the lucky one to secure the knockdown, it is rumored, at the amazingly low figure of $1,600 and the taxes, which were very small. The necessary limit of time after the tax sale (two years) has recently expired, and he therefore receives his clear deed. The house stands on about seven acres of land on one of the prettiest spots in Winnipeg. The doctor proposes to take up his residence there next spring. As Mr. Sutherland, however, claims to hold a tax receipt, and alleges that his property was illegally sold the claimant will probably not secure possession as easily as anticipated.

A correspondent in Summerside, P.E.I., writes:—An honest, but poor, couple living up west, were lately married. Provisions being rather short, the husband started with his axe for the woods to earn an honest penny. While chopping the axe glanced from a tree, going deep into his boot. Near y fainting he dropped his axe and started limping home. His wife, who was washing, beheld her husband with much difficulty dragging himself home. She at once ran to his assistance and got him into the house, when the large red mark in his boot proved too much for his nerves. His wife was obliged to get off his boot alone as best she could. Expecting to find a fearful wound, she was happily surprised to see that what both had imagined to be blood was only red flannel—which he had put on in lieu of socks, while his only pair were being washed and dried—protruding from his boot.

Work of Organized Charity for a Year.

The Charity Organization Society of New York City, has just made public its annual statement. It says that 1,153 street beggars have been dealt with in the past twelve moths, 716 of whom were able-bodied, and only 60 apparently needy and worthy, and 157 were not destitute and had means of self-support, while 504 were persistently dissolute. It divides its beggars into two distinct classes, those who beg for means in order to carry on their dissolute habits and those who make a business of begging because it pays better than honest work and whose success is a constant temptation to honest working people. As an illustration of the first class the following case is cited:

"John C——, fifty years of age, a blind and lame beggar, was arrested. He had a tin sign hung around his neck with the following: 'Blind and lame by an explosion! Charity is the noblest work of man. Our hope is in thee.' He was so drunk that he had to prop himself against an elevated railroad pillar, and had to be carried to the station house. On investigation it was found that he was a drunkard and a dissolute man lodging in James-st., with lewd women, and his only aim was to get money for self-indulgence."

As an illustration of the second class, it says, "A fine-looking man with a long white beard, who bore upon his breast a placard reading: "I am blind; I have a wife and five children," was arrested as a professional beggar and committed for six months to the workhouse. He is not totally blind. He can see with one eye to play cards every night in Baxter-st. He has a wife, who does not live with him, and no children to support, and he has a bank account of $1,000."

In conclusion the report states that from past experiences the society is convinced that there is no real need of justification for street begging, and to encourage it does more harm than good.

Rules For Winter.

There are a number of rules for winter going the rounds of the press, which, while very good in their way, will admit of some slight improvement. We will give a few for the benefit of those who have not sense enough to observe them without instruction:

Never lean the back upon anything that is cold. Do not select a chunk of ice or a snow drift to lean upon, and if your feet should suddenly slide from under you, thus bringing your back in contact with an icy sidwalk, get up immediately and hurry away, as you remaining in that position might occasion remarks.

Never begin a journey until the breakfast has been eaten. If you have no appetite you can always get some one to eat the breakfast for you.

Never take warm drinks and then immediately go out in the cold air. Sit around the stove and tell jokes for a while, or play a game of billiards. It will be more beneficial to the saloon keeper.

Never go to bed with cold feet. If your wife insists on having cold feet, sleep in another room, as to do otherwise would compel you to violate the first rule given above.

Never omit regular bathing. Every man should bathe at least once during the winter, and do it regularly.

Never speak much when hoarse, or the voice may be permaneutly lost. Observe this rule strictly yourself, but do not attempt to impose it upon your mother-in-law.

Never keep the back to the fire after it gets warm enough, because by continuing to do so you are liable to get burned.

When going from one atmosphere into a colder one, keep the mouth closed. If you contemplate a trip to the North Pole, do not mention it, or you may be considered a fit subject for a lunatic asylum.

Never stand still in very cold weather, or exposed to a cold wind, because—but any fool knows enough to observe this rule without telling him.

Why the Nightingale Sings.

The Westphalians have a curious explanatory myth regarding the nightingale. They imagine that the bird's song may be rendered in these syllables of human speech: Is tit, is tit, is tit, to wit, to wit—Trizy, Trizy. Trizy, to bucht, to bucht, to bucht. But the last syllables are the usual shepherd's cry to his dog when he wishes his sheep collected. Therefore Trizy must be the name of the dog to whom the cry to bucht is addressed. Therefore the nightingale must have been a shepherdess, whom a shepherd cursed because she always postponed the marriage she had promised. He uttered the wish that she might not sleep till the day of judgment. Nor does she, for may not her voice still be heard at night as she cries to bucht, to bucht, to bucht to her good dog Trizy? The same people give a strange explanation of the face of the shard, or flounder, which is all awry, with its eyes on one side of its face instead of being straight, like the eyes of most other fish. Originally its face was a straight and sensible fish face, but one day he insulted a passing herring and made a mocking face at it, for which, as a punishment, it was never able to draw its face back to its original position.

"Do you know, Featherwaite, Maud Smythe plays poker very well, indeed; says it is her favorite game." "Judging from her wealth of bustle, I should say her favorite game was backgammon."

"And did he say all that, Pat?" "Yis, yer riverence, all thim names he called me, an' sis I, 'I wouldn't demane meself to lose me temper wid such a low blaggard,' so I just knocked him over wid the sthick and cum away."

HOUSEHOLD.

Kitchen Reforms for This Year.

Some individual who has probably spent considerable time in the kitchen courting the hired girl, has noted the many leakages which cause the head of the family to growl. In making the slate of reform for the New Year, just glance over this little bill of particulars:

In cooking meats the water is thrown out without removing the grease, or the grease from the drippin-pan is thrown away.

Scraps of meat are thrown away.

Cold potatoes are left to sour and spoil.

Dried fruits are not looked after and become wormy.

Vinegar and sauce are left standing in tin.

The tea-cannister is left open.

Victuals are left exposed to be eaten by mice.

Bones of meat and the carcass of turkey are thrown away, when they could be used in making good soups.

Sugar, tea, coffee and rice are carelessly spilled in handling.

Soup is left to dissolve and waste in the water.

Dish-towls are used for dish-cloths.

Napkins are used for dish-towels.

Towels are used for holders.

Brooms and mops are not hung up.

More coal is burned than necessary by not arranging dampers when not using the fire.

Lights are left burning when not used.

Tin dishes are not properly cleansed and dried.

Good new brooms are used in scrubbing kitchen floors.

Silver spoons are used in scraping kettles.

Cream is left to mold and spoil.

Mustard is left to spoil in the cruse, etc.

Vinegar is left to stand until the vessel becomes corroded and spoiled.

Pickles become spoiled by the leaking out or evaporation of the vinegar.

Pork spoils for want of salt, and beef because the brine wants scalding.

Hams become tainted or filled with vermin for want of care.

Cheese molds and is eaten by mice and vermin.

Tea and coffee pots are injured on the stove.

Woodenware is unscalded and left to warp and crack.

Care of Lamps.

The necessity for the proper care of lamps cannot be too strongly impressed on every one who has charge of a household, for illy trimmed, foul lamps not only cause serious discomfort and annoyance, but more or less aggravated disorder of the health of every one who breathes the air contaminated by them. Some hints as to their management will doubtless be welcome, especially at this time of the year, when so much comfort depends upon good illumination. The use of kerosene in one form or another is so universal, even in great cities, and its full brilliancy is so rarely attained, that any information leading to that end is of great value. No medium used for household lighting produces, under given conditions, so soft, so brilliant, and so steady a flame as the best qualities of kerosene. The given conditions are absolute cleanliness of the lamp, the wick, and the oil, also the chimney. To attain the first it will be necessary once a week or a fortnight at least to empty the lamp of its contents and wash it inside and out with hot soap and water and a little washing soda. When clean rinse again and again to remove all traces of soap, then invert the lamp and leave it to drain until perfectly dry. The burner, if new, may be kept nice and bright by occasional dipping in kerosene, which might be kept in a bowl for the purpose; after the dipping polish with a bit of fine woolen cloth. If the burner is badly blackened take a little fine ashes and an old tooth brush, moisten the ashes with ammonia water and scrub vigorously; then rinse, and polish with flannel. The next step will be to place a new wick in the burner; wicks are not costly; they should therefore, for purposes of proper burning and good illumination, be used only a week, and then removed, as during that time they have absorbed sufficient impurities from the oil to become charged with them to a degree interfering with the best powers of the oil for illumination. Indeed, the weekly renewal of wicks is a saving in the end, because clean wicks burn less oil than impure ones. Lamp wicks should be trimmed every day with great care; this cannot be done without a sharp scissors of suitable size. Many persons merely rub the top of the charred part of the wick to insure evenness of flame, instead of cutting it. This is not a good practice, as it causes the top of the wick to become clogged with impurity. Cut the wick square across the wick tube. If the top of the burner is immovable raise the wick above the cupola and trim it as evenly straight across as possible, and then cut off the extreme points or corners. This can all be easily done if you use a good sharp scissors of suitable size, but not otherwise. It is claimed by those who profess to know, that wicks made of felt are greatly superior to the ordinary cotton wicks, and doubtless this is the case, because the felt presents no network for entanglement with the small toothed wheel that elevates and lowers the wick. The lamp and wick having been treated, we must next consider the chimney, that brittle object which causes such annoyance by its tendency to breaking at most unexpected junctures. This brittleness results from insufficient, or rather imperfect annealing of the lamp glass in its manufacture, and may be in great measure remedied by the simple process of putting the chimneys into a kettle of cold water, and gradually heating them till the water boils, after which they must be allowed to cool very gradually. This might be repeated several times with good results, after which they must be polished with a soft, clean dry cloth. If soot collects in the chimney from any sudden turning the wick too high, or by exposure of the flame to draught, brush it out with one of the chimney brushes, which should constitute part of the lamp equipment in every well regulated kitchen, and then rub and polish with clean cloth on the end of a small mop of cotton wick. Another annoyance connected with kerosene lamps is their tendency to becoming greasy on the outside from the condensation of the vapor of the oil. This may be greatly obviated if not altogether prevented by taking a piece of felt cloth and cutting a hole in the middle of it so that it may fit closely about the socket into which the burner is screwed. The felt may be trimmed, after you find the right size, to form a ring about half an inch wide, which should be kept on the socket to prevent, as far as possible, the escape of the very volatile vapor of the kerosene.

All the routine connected with the care of lamps should be performed in the early morning hours, and at a regular time. This being observed it will only be necessary to give the lamp a slight dusting or rubbing with a cloth before lighting it and bringing it to the table or sitting room in the evening. Having observed carefully these directions, the housewife will be rewarded by the brilliant, steady soft glow of the lamps that cheer and light the evening hours. It remains only to advise that the housewife select good lamps when purchasing, and to use them only when the wick is turned up to its best capacity for illumination without smoke; in a word, never to allow a lamp to burn with its wick turned low, as the effects are most injurious to the atmosphere of a room, and consequently to its tenants, beside being most disagreeable.

Formidable Iron-Clads.

In addition to a formidable list of gunboats, unarmored cruisers, torpedo cruisers, and torpedo-boats the English admiralty has in hand two classes of iron-clads that may fairly rank as first-rate. The first of these —which might be called the "Admiral" class, each ship being named after some famous British admiral—consists of what are termed "barbette ships," from the fashion in which the guns are mounted. These are: The Anson, Benbow, Camperdown, Collingwood, Howe and Rodney. The Imgerieuse and Warspite are also ships of the same type, but somewhat smaller than the "Admiral" class, though in proportionate horse-power they are even more formidable. The six "Admiral" ships have a tonnage ranging from 9,150 in the Collingwood to 10,000 in the Anson, Benbow and Camperdown; and a horse-power ranging from 7,500 in the three last named vessels to 11,150 in the Rodney. Each of these ships will be mounted with either ten or twelve guns, and in every case at least two of these guns will be of the 110-ton pattern. The Benbow recently made her trial trip, and steamed 70 knots in four hours—an average of 17½ knots an hour, a speed exceeded by very few war ships afloat, even counting cruisers specially built for speed. And swift as the Benbow has shown herself to be, the Collingwood, Howe, Rodney, Warspite, and Imperieuse will be far swift.

The second class of first-rate iron-clads consists of turret-ships. Hitherto English turret-ships have been rather slow. The Inflexible can scarcely make fourteen knots an hour, and the Devastation is still slower. But by vastly increasing the proportion of horse-power as compared with tonnage the admiralty has got over this difficulty. While the Devastation, with a tonnage of 9,330, has only 6,650 horse-power, the Renown and Sans Pareil, now being constructed, have a horse-power of not less than 12,000, against a tonnage of 10,400. These two ships are to be mounted with fifteen guns each, these in the turrets being, of course, of the largest type. There is also another turret-ship, smaller than these, but surely a formidable vessel, the Edinburgh, 9,140 tons, 7,520 horse-power, nine guns.

Nothing is so noticeable in recent English war-ships as the great proportionate increase of horse-power to tonnage, showing the importance attached to speed. For the broadside ships Agincourt and Minotaur the proportion of horse-power of tonnage was as six to ten. But this increase of horse-power over tonnage is most conspicuous of all in the torpedo ram Polyphemus, which, with a tonnage of 2,640, has a horse-power of 5,520.

These, then, are what they call first-rate iron-clads in Europe. Ships like these cost immense sums of money; but there are not a few men in England who would gladly pay 5 shillings in the pound income tax if by so doing they could secure to their fleet unquestionable supremacy.

STATISTICS.

Russia produces two-thirds of the total flax-supply of Europe, or about 350,000 tons of stripped flax. Britain imported 1,186,827 cwt. of flax from Russia in 1885, at a cost of £2,083,579. The quality of the Russian flax is far inferior to that of the Irish commodity.

There are no fewer than 2,067 architects and 1,173 surveyors in London, while of builders there are 7,333. The total aggregate of all the various classes of trades who are engaged in the great constructional art is a little in excess of 125,000; if we take into account the entire kingdom, we reach an estimated total of 688,114.

In England and Wales at the last census there were, over twenty-five years of age, 569,864 more women than men. In the Colonies the state of things is reversed. In Canada there is, on the entire population of all ages, an excess of 53,000 males; in New South Wales, of more than 100,000; Victoria, 68,000; in South Australia, 25,000; in Tasmania, 8,000; and in all the others a proportionate outnumbering of the fair sex.

South Australia is the leading wheat exporter among the Australian colonies, though the quantity exported to England in recent years has fluctuated greatly. Of the 2,786,000 acres of land under cultivation nearly 2,000,000 are under wheat, the great cereal crop of the colony, for which much of the southern region is adapted, and for which patches are here and there found favourable in other districts. The value of the total export in 1884 was £2,491,000, and of this £861,250 worth went to England; in 1880 the amount was over £1,000,000 sterling.

A number of the men enrolled in the British Volunteer force are young in years and also in length of service. Of the 224,012 enrolled last year 90,863 were under 22 years of age. Between that and 30 there were last year 84,499 enrolled; between 30 and 35, 19,657; between 35 and 40, 12,739; between 40 and 45, 8,499; between 45 and 50, 5,282; and over 50, 2,471. There were 121,382 with less than three years' service, or 7,000 more than in the year before; of men with between three and four years' service the total was 21,586. Altogether there were last year in the force 26,587 who had served 10 years and upwards, as compared with 25,764 in 1884. The number of men who joined during the year was 50,828.

"GOOD-BYE!"

BY JOHN IMRIE, TORONTO.

"Good-bye! good-bye!" what kindly words,
As they fall on the parting ear;
Like the singing of summer birds,
With their wonderful power to cheer:
Their meaning true—
"God-be-with-you!"
With kiss and sigh—
"Good-bye! good-bye!"

"Good-bye! good-bye!" means not "Farewell!"
But a wish for our Father's care;
How sweet when hearts their fullness tell
In the words of that loving prayer:
"Good-bye! good-bye!"
May God be nigh;
The meaning true—
"God-be-with-you!"

The words are sometimes idly said—
Like passing sunbeams on the wall—
And on the heart falls cold and dead,
'Tis then no fervent prayer at all
But plain—"good-bye!"—
A formal cry—
No kiss nor sigh—
Ah, friends—why? why?

Remember when we say—"Good-bye!"
Life is uncertain, short, and fleet;
Then, let the love-light in your eye
Show friendship's bond is strong and sweet!
Thus, hand-in-hand,
Friends understand
The meaning true—
"God-be-with-you!"

The Earth-Worm's Work.

It is only recently that science has come to understand fully the service which the earth-worm—the humble creature which some Canadian boys call the "angle-worm," and others the "mud-worm"—performs in the economy of the world.

It is now known that, burrowing steadily in the earth, he does valuable work for agriculture. The little holes which he makes let in the air and light to damp places, and conduct to the roots of the plants the leaf-mould and surface accumulations of all sorts which these plants need for their nourishment. But more than this, the worms bring to the surface the finely powdered earth which they consume in their burrowings, and scatter it over the soil.

Two earth-worms, put in a glass vase eighteen inches in diameter, filled with sand covered with dry leaves, managed first to sink the leaves entirely beneath the sand, and then to cover the sand with a thin coating of humus, or mould. All this was accomplished in six months.

One earth-worm will bring to the surface about seven grains avoirdupois of earth in a day. This is a very small quantity of earth, but if we multiply it by fifty-six thousand, the average number of worms to an acre, we have more than fifty pounds of earth raised every day.

From the 9th of October, 1870, to the 14th of October, 1871, the worms upon one field in England brought up eight tons of earth, and in another field sixteen tons. A field in Staffordshire is covered annually by the worms with a deposit of earth nearly a quarter of an inch in thickness.

By the slow toil of the earth-worms, rocks are buried in the ground and the surface of the earth is modified. It is chiefly their work which has buried the ruins of dead cities under the ground.

The Jingle of the Bells.

Ah! the fleecy flakes are falling
Through the frosty winter night,
And January winds are calling
Us to scenes of rare delight!
There are roguish eyes that glisten,
As the snow of pleasure tells;
And the rustic sweethearts listen
For the jingle of the bells—
For the jingle and the tingle
Of the merry winter bells.

In the Cupid-haunted valley,
'Twixt the old hills lying low,
Where the summer breezes daily,
Falls the lover-cherished snow.
Oh, the silence of to-morrow
Will be broken in the dells!
And the heart will gladness borrow
From the jingle of the bells—
From the tinkle, tinkle, tinkle
Of the never ceasing bells.

Jingle! jingle! In the starlight,
Tinkle! tinkle! in the dark,
Gliding swiftly toward the far light
In the window, but a spark!
There can be no joys completer
Than the ones the snow foretells:
Ah! my darling, what is sweeter
Than a kiss behind the bells—
As they jingle, jingle, jingle
O'er the snow, the sleighing bells!

Life is but a dream of pleasure
That returns with every snow,
Winter fills to-day the measure
Emptied often long ago.
'Neath the cutter's furry covers
Many a heart with rapture swells,
And the merry laugh of lovers
Greets the jingle of the bells—
Greets the laughter and the jingle
Of the ever-merry bells!

On the road and in the wildwood
Nature dons a robe of white,
And the happy laugh of childhood
Will be heard to-morrow night!
Everywhere the bells will jingle
'Neath the starry sentinels,
And the lassie's cheek will tingle
With the kiss the sound impels—
With a kiss that gently mingles
With the laughter of the bells!

Oh, the bells my heart remembers,
With their music soft and low!
Oh, the sleigh bells of the winters
Buried in the long ago!
I remember eyes that glistened
When the snow was in the dells;
I remember ears that listened
For the jingle of the bells—
For the jingle, jingle, jingle
Of the rich and jolly bells.

MEN AND WOMEN.

Chesterfield said, "No woman is homely when tastefully dressed."

At Queen Victoria's table there are three servants to every six guests.

A London lady, who recently died, left £100 to a poor clergyman and £10,000 to the dog's home.

St. Petersburg is in ecstacies over a female tenor, and yet almost any female can sing tenor; the trouble is to find a male who can.

The Queen-mother of Spain has made an agreement with her creditors, by which she keeps $200,000 of her revenue and they take the remaining $120,000. Her life is heavily insured.

We are now to hear of lectures by a royal personage. The Queen of Rumania, already a poet, has engaged to deliver a course of lectures on Modern Literature next year at the Bucharest High School.

The beautiful and costly state carriage built for the triumphal entry—which never took place—of the Comte de Chambord into Paris is now the state carriage of the Queen of Greece. She paid $5,000 for it, about half of what it cost.

In Bavaria it is not good form for a lady to shake hands with a gentleman until she is well acquainted with him, and no unmarried woman is allowed to speak on the street to any of her friends of the opposite sex, no matter how well she may know them.

It seems that Lieut. Greely believes in the theory that there is an open sea, some 1,500 miles in diameter, round about the Pole that never freezes, the conjecture being that the Pole itself is the centre of an ice-capped land, covered with ice from 1,000 to 4,000 feet thick.

"The Intransigeant" states that the famous treasure of Hue, captured by General de Courey in the Imperial Palace and sent to France, and which was supposed to be worth 15,000,000 francs, turns out to be on examination of no value at all. The supposed bars of silver are simply lead.

"William Black, the novelist, has obtained a verdict for £100 damages against Bow Bells for libelous assertions respecting his early life and parsimonious habits. The main injury was that it called him a "canny Scotsman" and accused him of marrying for financial advancement.

Mr. Gladstone was paid $1,250 for his article in the Nineteenth Century Review on Lord Tennyson's "Locksley Hall Sixty Years After," which is one of the largest, if not the largest, price ever paid in England for so short an essay. However, it was a lucky hit for the Review, as it had an enormous sale in consequence.

Queen Victoria is reported to be breaking very rapidly and to be conscious that she cannot live very many years longer. There is a general apprehension among the people of England that the Queen may not live till the year is completed. The appearance of old age is most clearly marked in her jubilee portrait, which has just been completed and placed in the gallery leading to her private apartments at Windsor.

The Century Magazine prints for the first time these words of Abraham Lincoln, given in an official reprimand to a young officer who had been court martialed for quarrelling: "The advice of a father to his son, 'Beware of entrance to a quarrel, but being in, bear it that the opposed may beware of thee!' is good, but not the best. Quarrel not at all. No man resolved to make the most of himself can spare time for personal contention. Still less can he afford to take all the consequences, including the vitiating of his temper and the loss of self-control. Yield larger things to which you can show no more than equal right, and yield lesser ones, though clearly your own. Better give your wrath to a dog than be bitten by him in contesting for the right. Even killing the dog would not cure the bite."

IS WAR INEVITABLE?

A FOREIGN DIPLOMATIST'S OPINION.

In the course of conversation a foreign diplomatist, whom a long career in the various capitals of Europe has rendered especially well adapted to pronounce an opinion on the present political situation, made the following remarks:—

THE RUSSO-GERMAN TREATY.

I do not believe in the existence of the alleged treaty between Russia and Germany, which I consider to have originated in the imaginative mind of my good friend Mr. de Blowitz. Of course most of the persons holding any prominent official positions to whom you may apply for their views on the present situation will declare that everything points towards the maintenance of peace. There are but few holding responsible diplomatic positions who could afford to utter any contrary opinion for publication without exposing themselves to receiving a severe rap over the knuckles for their indiscretion. The real truth is that we all expect an early outbreak of war, which cannot be long delayed.

PREPARING FOR THE STRUGGLE.

Why, even here in England, we are informed that Lord Salisbury intends to divert public attention from the troubles at home by inaugurating a vigorous foreign policy abroad, and military preparations are the order of the day. You know that several battalions of the Guards have been instructed to hold themselves ready for foreign service, and are being submitted to a special medical examination,. Now, the Guards are rarely despatched abroad unless some extremely important campaign is in prospect. Who knows if the determination of Lord Salisbury to adopt a military foreign policy unsuited to Great Britain has not been one of the principal reasons of Lord Randolph Churchill's withdrawal from the Cabinet?

SIGNIFICANT INTELLIGENCE.

See the significant military intelligence that reaches us from Constantinople. Turkey is massing an enormous force in Macedonia. A fortnight ago there were over a hundred and twenty battalions of infantry and thirty-six batteries of artillery in the Macedonian provinces. This enormous concentration of troops in the present season and in the present state of Turkish finances could not have been intended for show purposes. The Turks must be looking forward to a war on the Macedonian frontier, and they are not quite certain whether it may not begin before the winter is over.

AN EARLY WAR INEVITABLE.

Moreover, the intense hostility which exists between the Russian and German populations renders an early war inevitable. Do you imagine that Prince Bismarck is fool enough to wait until the Czar has had time to arm his immense army with repeating rifles and has doubled the single line of railroad at present running along the western frontier of Russia? Not only the financial and economical condition of Russia, but also the intense and widespread discontent pervading all classes of the Czar's subjects renders it inevitable that Alexander III. will soon give way to the demands of the Pan-Slavists and seek to direct public attention from internal difficulties by a popular war with Germany.

GIRDING FOR THE FIGHT.

Concerning France, it is needless to talk. Not a day passes but that the newspapers contain accounts of the preparations which Gen. Boulanger is making for the coming struggle. As to Austria and Italy, notwithstanding their immense financial difficulties, they are running the risk almost of national bankruptcy in their efforts to prepare for the struggle which may now break out at any moment, but the commencement of which will hardly be delayed beyond next April. See also Prince Bismarck's anxiety to get the bill for the increase of the German army by 10 per cent. passed through the Reichstag. No, no; I do not believe in the maintenance of peace. Preparations would not have been made on such a scale and at such immense sacrifice were not the struggle more imminent than is generally supposed.

"Does it Pay to Be a Woman?"

The above question is being agitated in many of our exchanges, and many of the views respecting it are very amusing. One writer, evidently a woman whose path in life has been a thorny one, complains bitterly that it does not pay to be a woman and receive three hundred dollars a year for the same work that a man would be paid six or eight hundred for doing. At the same time she calls attention to the fact that when a man usurps a woman's province, he still receives double pay, as in the case of cooks and laundrymen.

Another "woman" finds it an easy matter to "Sit on a cushion and sew up a seam,

And live upon strawberries, sugar and cream."

She does not appear to reflect, that to many of us the seam is an endless one, that all cushions are not of damask and down, that much of the "cream" of life is only skim milk, and that it is given to only a few of us to have our strawberries served upon Sevres.

Since, however, the matter is one beyond our control, and having begun life as women we cannot well change our role, it seems to me that the more pertinent question is, "What manner of women shall we be?"

Surely a woman pays her sex a poor compliment in ceaselessly lamenting that heaven has not made her "such" a man. In the present enlightened age, we women have really very little cause for complaint; nearly every business and all professions are open to us.

Some years ago, a lady moving in the most refined circles of New York, with an elegant home and every enjoyment in life that money could buy, by a sudden reverse of fortune that often comes to the very wealthy, lost every dollar of her money. I next saw her in the log cabin of a California settlement, doing for her family the duties of nurse, cook and seamstress. In the one room that did duty for parlor, nursery and bedroom, with the aid of the tin wash basin that took the place of her luxurious bath-room and toilet equipments, she cheerfully washed the hands and faces and smoothed the curls of her little ones, with a smile and cheerful word for all. It "pays" to be such a woman. "Her children shall rise up and call her blessed, her husband, he praiseth her."

Carpets may be brightened by dusting with a damp flannel mop.

Editorial Notes.

—The European war cloud is perceptibly darker and heavier now than it appeared to be a week ago. And the main cause for anxiety is the irregressible conflict between France and Germany, which it appears must be fought over again, and that ere long.

—The Canadians of the United States talk of making grand parades in the great American cities on the occasion of the Queen's Jubilee. If this is carried out it will amount to a demonstration of the strength of Canada in the United States, which should and will cause United States executives some thought. In Boston and New York they number scores of thousands while in Chicago and North-Western cities they form a large proportion of the whole population. Canadians in exile do not lose their love for Canada; they remain loyal at heart to their country.

Flesherton.

From our own correspondent.

Again it falls our painful duty to notice the somewhat sudden death of another of our respected citizens Mr. James Hopps, who a few days ago was in his usual health when seized by inflammation of the lungs and after a brief illness breathed his last; deceased leaves a young widow and several small children to mourn the loss of a husband and father. He being a member of the Orange Society his remains was taken charge of by them and on Sabbath afternoon last was laid in the grave with Orange honors. The cortege was large, led by the Flesherton Brass Band playing appropriate music. In the evening the Rev. Mr. Ayers preached a funeaal sermon in the Methodist Church selecting for his text. "Prepare to meet thy God" from which he delivered an impressive discourse.

Dr. Jamieson of Durham the Nominee of the Conservative party for South Grey, in the Commons, is this week in Fleshert on arranging for a thorough canvas in this Township for the approaching elections.

Professor Morgan (who is blind) and his little daughter Fairy, are in our town at present and purpose giving a concert in the Town Hall on Wednesday evening, after which the Prof. intends forming classes for "Cantata" "Little Red Riding Hood" for children and "Lost and Saved" for adults.

An evening of enjoyment was fully realized by about ninety persons assembeled in the "Odd Fellows" Hall here on Monday evening last, being the annual reunion and an Oyster Supper given by the members of that order here. Various table and parlor games were provided for the amusement of all while the string band inspired all by the sweet strains of sweet music. The Oyster department was not one whit behind, the tables were laden with good things as it approached the small hour of morning the company dispersed apparently well pleased with the evenings entertainment.

Meaford Road.

From our own Correspondent.

The holiday season has once more come and gone and 1886 with all its tender associations joyous incidents and sad events have faded into the past.

The excitement of the Ontario and Municipal elections has abated, and now that the date of the Dominion elections is fixed we may expect that to be the most exciting event for some time to come.

At the annual school meeting here M. D. Thompson was elected trustee, and at the same meeting a resolution was passed instructing the trustees to discontinue the use of the scripture selections, or so called "Ross Bible" authorized by the Minister of Education and use in the place the old "St James" Bible.

The Xmas tree of the Wesley Sabbath School was held on Tuesday evening the 18th and considering the extreme cold weather and bad roads was fairly attended. The proceeds amounted to $15, the gifts were very handsome and were heartily appreciated by the recipients. Those who had the choosing of them evidently understood their business and the art of pleasing.

We regret to learn the sudden demise of Mr James Hops who died at his father-in-law's residence last week.—"In the midst of life we are in death."

Stormy weather.

Great drifts.

No mail for several days.

Sudden change, every appearance of a thaw, bare ground to be seen already.

We regret to record the death of our esteemed friend Mr. Duncan Heron, who died last Monday night 17th inst., the funeral took place on Wednesday, and notwithstanding the severity of the weather, a large number of relatives and friends were present to pay the last tribute of respect to the memory of the deceased. Much sympathy is felt for the family in their bereavement.

Willie, son of Mr Robt. Gordon had his hand severely frost bitten, when on on his way to school last Monday morning.

On the 19th inst., Rev. Mr. Ferrier was visited by a wedding party from Feversham. The party, when returning from the parsonage. were greeted with hearty cheers. We wish them a long and happy life.

Hurrah for the girls of our village! they are not afraid of a snowball. Two of our girls undertook to snowball a married man of our village, but sad to say, the girls were badly defeated. We sympathize with them.

Blantyre.

It is our sad duty to record the death of Mrs. Alexander T. McCutcheon, daughter of Angus Mcinnis of this place, which took place on Monday the 13th inst., at Mono Centre. Deceased was married about three years ago and resided with her husband a short time in Rocklyn, from thence they moved to Mono Centre. Deceased was a very highly respected young woman and leaves one child about 15 months old. Previous to her death she requested to be buried in Temple Hill cemetery, Euphrasia by the Odd Fellows of Loyal Lansdowne Lodge, C. O. O. F. Blantyre, (of which Lodge her husband is a member and was the first N. G. of the Lodge) but on account of the great storm few were in attendance. The Lodge met on Wednesday evening after the burial and granted the funeral Donation to Bro. iMcCutcheon and tendered to him the following resolution of condolance :—

Loyal Lansdowne Lodge, No. 91, C. O. O. F. Moved by Joseph W. Patton, seconded by Albert C. Paterson, whereas Almighty God in his mysterious providence has saw fit to afflict our highly esteemed brother Alexander McCutcheon by terminating the existence on earth of his beloved wife and partner in life, and whereas the high esteem in which she was held by the members of our Lodge severally and collectively and her conduct while amongst us being very worthy of mention, be it resolved by Lansdowne Lodge No. 91, Blantyre, that it causes us great pain and grief to record the death of one whose short intercourse amoungst us was so exceedingly pleasant, yet we painfully realize the loss which our dear brother has sustained and deeply sympathize with him, also relatives and friends of the diseased in their sad bereavement, and we trust when our dear brother is called away from our earthly Lodge that he may have the pleasure of meeting the loved one in the Grand Lodge above around the Great White Throne, and may he rest on the happy assurance given that "when this earthly house of her tabernacle was dissolved she had a building of God an house not made with hands Eternal in the Heavens to be forever with the Lord."

An aged father mourns the loss,
Likewise two sisters dear.
Three dearest brothers lonely left,
Laments and drops a tear.

HEALTH.

How "This Climate Don't Agree With My Constitution."

BY W. A. BLAKELY.

"I came out here for my health, and I have lived here three years now, and am no better than when I came. This climate don't agree with my constitution." As I heard a neighbor make this remark, I said to myself: I should not think it would; nor any other climate either. The man was well built, and had a well formed brain; but neither his body nor his brain was doing him very good service. He was broken down in health, and his head troubled him considerably.

It was readily apparent to the close observer why one of the most healthful climates, a genial sun, and an invigorating atmosphere, did not have a beneficial effect upon the "patient." On visiting the place, one saw a house of pleasant appearance, a large frame barn, an easy carriage, and general conveniences for comfort.

But on entering the house, I found that he did not live in "this climate" at all, but that he had an "artificial climate" peculiar to the Mr. Johnston's place. The air was warm and close; every window was closed for fear that the health of the family, which, of course, was in a very bad condition, might suffer if a particle of outside air should enter! In fact, the room really smelled bad for want of proper ventilation. I bore it patiently (apparently), not having a "sextant" to whom I could "appeal" to open the "winders" and let in some "are." Then after learning what constituted his usual bill of fare, I could plainly see that I had been right in thinking that neither this nor any other climate would "agree with his constitution." In fact, his surroundings and dietry were enough to ruin any constitution, however strong it might be naturally. Flesh-meats, including pork, were largely eaten. The food was taken into the stomach rapidly, in an insufficiently masticated state, being washed down by hot drinks,—he invariably having tea, coffee, or chocolate for breakfast, coffee for dinner, and tea for supper. Pickles and the usual list of highly seasoned, unhealthful, and indigestible, so-called foods, were in abundance. "Variety was the spice of death" on that table. Insufficient exercise, foul air, and a stomach oqerloaded with an excess of innutritious food, is pretty sure to make any climate affect an invalid in the same way as our neighbor was affected.

But we find such people everywhere. The medical business in this country is simply enormous. Invalids are almost innumerable. Yet all of these things are laid to "climate," "misfortune," "too much business," "overwork," etc.

It is truly a "misfortune" for any one to be sick. But generally it is the individual himself who is to blame. If the proper attention be paid to the laws of health, a person can, as a rule, do almost any kind of work or live in almost any climate. But doctors may warn the people, our health journals bring it repeatedly before their minds, and our public men lecture on the subject over and over again, and still these people live on as before; apparently, they love to have it so.

Another common complaint is "too much business." A man gets up in the morning, eats his breakfast—perhaps his food may be of a wholesome character,—and he then goes to work. In a short time, somebody calls and offers him some fruit, which, of course, he takes; he also has a few crackers with some fruit, for a lunch whenever he gets hungry. After eating an apple or two, or an orange, this suffices him until dinner time. This is repeated in the afternoon. Then, as he has work to do in the evening, he takes some supper. From two to five hours are spent in work, and then he retires.

The next morning he wakes up with a headache. He has no appetite for his breakfast. "I worked entirely too hard yesterday," he says, (well, he probably did with his digestive organs). His stomach cannot work properly, and after continuing some time in such a course, he is prostrated, and has our "heart-felt sympathies" because he has been "over-worked." He never seems to understand why his digestive organs do not work well, as he is "always careful to have only good, healthful food on his table; and fruit is among the very best of foods," he says in regard to that which he had eaten between meals. But it was not what he had eaten in his case; it was when and how.

It is a well known truth that the violation of Nature's laws will bring Nature's penalties. The stomach must have rest; if it is not given by the person voluntarily, it will be taken at his expense. When a person is constantly violating the most important principles of health, we certainly cannot be surprised to hear persons say, "This climate don't agree with my constitution"; and to find that "overwork" breaks down so many of our professional men.

Health Notes.

Keep your sleeping rooms well aired even in this cold weather. Many a headache and unpleasant taste in the mouth is caused by sleeping in impure atmosphere.

Men in business have a very bad habit of keeping their hats on in doers. To this cause may be ascribed the distinguishing mark of the middle aged Canadian—baldness.

None of the minor "ills" is more troublesome than an ingrowing nail. By pouring hot tallow over the nail, the hardened flesh about it is shrunken and relief is immediate.

When any part of the skin has been frozen, apply ice, snow or cold water. The vicinity of a fire and warm room should be avoided. If the part blisters treat it as you would a burn.

A drop of cold water, placed in the lobe of the ear, will put a stop to hiccough, or if this does not produce the desired effect, press firmly on the arteries of the wrist, where the pulse is felt.

No person should bathe when the body is fatigued by either mental or physical labor, or immediately after a meal. For bathing purposes, in summer, the water should be about 70°, in winter, 80°.

In case of being bitten by a snake or dog, suck the wound (spitting it out) bathe it with warm water to make it bleed freely. Tie a handkerchief around the limb above the wound. Give spirits and water to drink.

A good liniment to remove pain and swelling, from any part of the human body, is made by rubbing up one ounce of camphor in four ounces of olive oil. Rub briskly on the aching part and relief will soon be manifest.

An emetic that often proves valuable in threatened cases of croup, is composed as follows: Powder of Ipecacuanha and powdered alum, each one half teaspoonful. Mix with water, and repeat dose if it does not act in ten minutes.

Sore throat also is common at this time. An excellent gargle can be easily made by dissolving one teaspoonful of chlorate of potash and two teaspoonfuls of glycerine in a tumbler of water. As a gargle this is very soothing to the throat.

A sick-room should not be used as a parlor to receive company in. Be it child or adult, the excitement of meeting friends is always followed by great depression; the more severe the illness, the greater and more dangerous the depression.

Insomnia can be avoided by taking a short walk immediately before retiring. A good and harmless sleeping mixture, in extreme cases, is fifteen grains of chloral of hydrate mixed with half an ounce of orange-peel syrup, taken at bedtime.

Horse-back riding combines more qualities of healthful exercise than almost any other. It secures air, light, exercise, and pleasure. A ride—one ride a day—taken regularly, is both a preventive and a cure for nearly all human maladies. To some, advice must be given to ride slowly; but to others, we may say in the language of the old polypharmacentists: "When taken, to be well shaken."

There is no better medicine, no greater purifier, no better friend to good health, cleanliness, and long life and sunshine. There is an old proverb which says: "Where the sun does not enter, the doctor must." And the truth condensed in that statement is a whole lecture on the health of the home, Sunshine costs nothing, is refreshing, invigorating, life-giving to both sick and well. Peoyle have somehow gotten the idea that nothing is valuable which does not cost something, and are too likely to value all blessings by the money value they represent.

FARM.

Pure Air a Necessity.

The atmosphere is a most important factor in disease. It is always contaminated with dust containing minute particles which cause putrefaction and fermentation. It is now asserted that these cause all malarial and contagious diseases. Stagnation in the atmosphere acts as stagnation in water, which every one knows is unwholesome. The body requires a vast amount of air, and the poisons cast off by the human system are deadly. If breathed over and over again they are deleterious to the strongest constitution. Defective sewer pipes are perhaps the most serious cause of fevers. These should receive immediate attention as soon as bad odors are detected. Especially, let the house be well and frequently aired and its impurities swept away, as the tide draws off the drainage of a city and carries it out to the ocean

Facts Farmers Ought to Know.

Parsnips may be left in the ground through the winter.

Ground bone and kainit with some muriate of potash makes a good plant food for the peach orchard.

In purchasing hens select carefully from well known yards, to avoid the introduction of diseases and lice into flocks.

The production of oleomargarine for domestic consumption is officially estimated at the rate of one million pounds per year.

Progressive cultivators in the north-western States succeed in growing fair crops of peaches every year by giving winter protection.

Experiments made at the Michigan Agricultural college make it appear that the ashes of corn cobs have a value as manure of $2.50 per 100 pounds, which is more than twice that of hard wood or of wood ashes.

A common hoe, straightened out by a blacksmith, makes a cheap and excellent implement for chopping roots for stock.

Whether prices be up or down, prime mutton sheep are always salable, and at good prices. The markets are never supplied with choice mutton.

There is nothing better for the manure heap than soapsuds. It prevents fire-fanging, arrests the escape of volatile matter and hastens chemical changes and decomposition.

Farm profits vested in permanent improvements return larger dividends than when deposited in banks or invested in other directions. A farm cannot be to highly improved.

Mr. W. R. Halstead tried planting wheat in drills and cultivating it like corn. The production was doubled. He recommends planting the rows sixteen inches apart and cultivating with the bull-tongue plow. But it would be a lot of trouble.

The consumption of food by dairy stock is paid back in a three-fold way—milk, growth of stock, and the value of the manure, which last often balances the first cost of the food. It is in that respect that stock-raising is superior to exclusive grain growing.

Gilt-edged butter cannot be procured unless the udder and teats of the cow and the hands of the milker are washed before milking the cow. The milk must than be removed from the stable as quickly as possible, as it will absorb odors as soon as it becomes cool.

It would not be out of place if farmers would put their names over their gates, in order to assist those seeking particular residences. The plan is as applicable in the country as in the city. Even the farms along a road could be numbered from one town to another.

At this season, when the corn is being fed to the hogs, it should be remembered that the warmer and more comfortable the hogs are kept the less corn required. Before hogs can fatten the bodies must be supplied with sufficient heat to protect against cold, and the greater the amount of heat saved the larger the gain in fat.

A perfect strainer is made of three thicknesses of fine bolting-cloth in a tin frame, like the hoops of a hair-seive. It should be so constructed that the three cloths can be taken off and cleaned separately. Fine dust that will pass through one thickness of cloth or wire gauge will be arrested when two or three are held together, and but little will go through.

Though long custom has given the preference to large hogs, yet the small carcases sell better than the heavier when sent to market. Experience has taught many farmers that it is cheaper to make pork quickly than to keep pigs over winter in order to allow them fifteen months' growth instead of ten, as a good spring pig will be ready by Christmas.

If there be any materials that are unfit for use on the farm, such as tainted hay, leaves, or dried weeds, consign them to the flames, as it is much better to do so than to have them in the way. Fire will do more to destroy weed seeds and save labor during the growing season than any other agent. At this season get ready for the next by reducing the number of articles.

Do not store your root crops in mounds if it can be avoided, as it is difficult to get at them for use when the ground is frozen. Make bins in the barn, and pack them in dry earth or sand. Endeavor to avoid all the moisture possible. In this manner they will not only be protected from frost but will be within easy access and in any quantity desired during the coldest days of winter.

The following is the method of curing hams that received the prize at a New England fair: To every 100 pounds of meat take 8 pounds of salt, 2 ounces saltpetre, 2 pounds brown sugar, 1¼ ounces potash and 4 gallons water. Mix them and pour the liquid over the hams after they have been in the tub two days, they having been rubbed with fine salt when put in the tub. They should remain in this pickle six weeks, then taken out, hung up three days to dry and smoked.

Notoriety.

Public sentiment despises the desire for notoriety, and holds that man who is possessed by it to be not only a weak man, but, in a sense, a bad one. The popular explanation of the difference between the pursuit of fame and that of notoriety is that the man who loves fame seek it through lofty means, and the man who desires notoriety is regard less of means. People believe that the man is either false or willing to be false; that he will simulate or dissimulate qualities rather than give up his object, and does not seek it so much as he is possessed by it, till the sense of right and wrong, the becoming and the unbecoming, disappears from his mind. Right and wrong have become alike to him an overmastering desire for personal display which is not vanity, but a separate and lower passion. He craves to be noticed, instead of craving to be noticed with reverence or regard, and will knowingly lower himself rather than remain invisible in the crowd.

The Father's Hands Full.

Pa. "Johnny, what made you jump up in church to-day?"

Johnny. "Jimmy stuck a pin into me."

Pa. "Jimmy, don't you know that is no place to stick a pin in Johnny?"

Jimmy. "Father, if you will designate the exact part of brother John's body into which I can insert the pin in the future, I will promise you you will not have occasion to rep.ove brother John for acting so in church."

It Had Come at Last.

It is estimated that the workable seams of coal in Natal extend over an area of 1,400 square miles, and that the contents of this area amount to over 2,000,000,000 tons.

Each man has but a limited right to the good things of this world; and the natural allowed way by which he is to compass the possession of these things is by his own industrious acquisition of them.

Old and mutilated bank notes when returned to the United States Treasury are chopped up and made into a pulp, which is moulded into various shapes and forms. The latest design is a miniature bust of Mrs. Cleveland, which has a ready sale. It takes $10,000 worth of old bank notes to make one of these designs.

No teacher who does not try it can know how easy it is for children to use words they do not understand. We were in a school the other day when a pupil spelled "heroine." "Write it in a sentence," said the superintendent, with whom we were going the rounds. "I went heroine and caught many," wrote the child, who knows more of herrings than of the heroine.

The Purity of Mid-Atlantic Air.—In the course of an address on the action of micro-organisms on surgical wounds, Prof. F. S. Dennis, of New York, states that during his last trip across the Atlantic he made some experiments to test the purity of the air about 1,000 miles from land. He employed capsules of sterilized gelatine, and exposed them for fifteen minutes. One capsule was exposed in the stateroom upon the main deck of the steamer. Within 18 hours over 500 points of infection had developed. Two capsules exposed in a similar manner in a cabin on the promenade deck, where the circulation of air was free, showed five or six points of infection each ten days afterward. A capsule exposed over the bow of the ship was found to be entirely uncontaminated. These experiments are on the same lines as those of Pasteur and Tyndall upon the mountain air of Switzerland, and, so far as they go, they show the germless condition of mid-ocean air, and also the need for much more efficient ventilation in the staterooms of even the first-class American liners.

Catarrh, Catarrhal Deafness and Hay Fever.

Sufferers are not generally aware that these diseases are contagious, or that they are due to the presence of living parasites in the lining membrane of the nose and eustachian tubes. Microscopic research, however, has proved this to be a fact, and the result is that a simple remedy has been formulated whereby catarrh, catarrhal deafness and hay fever are cured in from one to three simple applications made at home. RIFT AND SPRAY,

OR,

LOVE AND VENGEANCE AMONG THE SMUGGLERS.

THE MOST FASCINATING OCEAN ROMANCE SINCE THE DAYS OF COOPER AND MARYATT.

CHAPTER XXIII.

DEAD MEN TELL NO TALES.

"So much for the Nancy," said Dolan. "Now, my men, pull for the cavern at once."

Bang went a gun from some vessel at this moment at the mouth of the bay.

Dolan uttered an exclamation of alarm. In the confined space of the little bay this gun sounded as though it were fired close at hand, although in reality it was more than a mile off. Yet it portended mischief, although Dolan almost immediately corrected his first impression as regarded its apparent proximity to the cavern.

"Quick, now, men!" he cried. "For your lives, quick! There is mischief in the offing."

The smuggler crew bent to their oars and the boats went swiftly through the water. They were soon under the deep shadow of the tall cliff, within which were those most mysterious cavernous recesses.

Then Dolan was compelled to venture upon the production of a light for a moment in order that those whom he had left in charge of the cavern might know that the approaching boats were friendly.

It was but for an instant that he permitted that light to be seen and then he took pains that no wandering ray from it, however faint, should travel seaward.

"Now," he said. "Ah, there again!"

Another report of a gun echoed across the still waters of the bay.

"The Spray," saida voice.

"No, no!" cried Dolan, "her cruise is surely over."

"I seem to know the sound of her guns," said the man who had spoken.

Dolan was silent for a moment or two and then he said:

"It may be—it may be the Spray; but we have little to fear from her while we keep our own counsel. Now we are at home."

The foremost boat shot into the cavernous recess and the others soon followed. Dolan blew a long, peculiar, wailing note upon his whistle, and then, mingled with the sighing of the night wind and the confused wash of the waves, the creaking of the pulleys, and the opening of the cliff was covered up, and all was calm and still in the sea cavern.

"Again a gun!"

The sound came in a more muffled fashion to their ears in the cavern, but it did come, and then Dolan called out:

"Let a couple of men go out in one of the small boats. Take a net with them and try and come up with the Spray in the offing, if she is there."

"Ay, sir!" said Bowline. "It's the Spray right enough, and, I take it, she has got a look at on the bay."

"Ah! We may have been seen, then."

"I don't think so, for it came into my head early, and I kept a bright lookout. The Spray will not make a prize of the Rift in this cruise."

"Hurrah!" shouted the sailors, as Bowline called out these words, in a tone of triumph.

"Silence!" said Dolan. "I think with you all, my men, that there is no danger now if we be but discreet. These shouts, however, may reach where they are not intended. I'm afraid there has been some treachery in this night's work."

There was a chorus of imprecations from the smugglers on these words from Dolan, and then Martin said:

"Captain Dolan, the crew want to know if you got the money from Mr. Suffles for the cargo. They didn't quite know in the dark and the confusion."

Dolan was silent for a moment and his right hand was plunged deep into his pocket clutching the five notes for a hundred pounds each, as the thought rapidly ran through his brain that, after all, he might appropriate them to his own use and then be none the wiser: but yet there was the suspicion that Martin knew he had the notes and had only said these words to test him.

Cupidity, however, got the better of the mental battle.

"No!" said Dolan.

"You have not the money, captain?"

"No; he was just going to pay me when the attack took place and I missed the money."

Hardly had these words passed the lips of Captain Dolan, when with a howl and a cry, some dark object bounded up from the bottom of one of the boats, and then the voice of Mr. Suffles cried:

"Don't believe him! I did pay him. It's my money—my five hundred pounds. I paid for the cargo, but the officers have it. Give me back my money. I'm a ruined man. Oh! give me back my money; it's all I have in the world—my five hundred pounds!"

Dolan, who had gained the deck of the Rift, fairly staggered at this most unexpected appearance of Mr. Suffles, and then he cried out:

"Seize him! seize him!—a spy! a spy! Seize him or you are all lost, my men!"

There was a rush to the boat and Mr. Suffles was laid hold of and held by half a dozen hands.

"You are a nice idiot!" said one. "Why don't you jump into the sea, instead of coming here?"

"My money! my money! Oh, my good men, don't do any harm to me. I only want my money. I got into one of your boats to get out of the way of the preventive men and to follow my money. Be honest. Honor, you know, among—hem! No I don't mean that. But you don't want to have my money if I don't get the cargo—eh?"

Mr. Suffles gazed about him in a scared sort of way as the flickering light of the torch that had been lit in the cavern when the orifice to the sea was closed shed an uncertain glare upon his terrified features.

"Hold him!" said Dolan. "Secure his hands. He is a spy and he maligns me. I have not his money!"

"Search me! Search me!" screamed Suffles. "I have no money but a few odd pounds about me. I paid him five hundred pounds in notes. Search me and then search me!"

"Why, you scoundrel!" said Dolan, in a rage in every tone, "how dare you come here and throw away your miserable lies with a lie on your lips? Hark ye, my men. This is all the plan between this man and the preventive station. The secret of your home here in the cliff is now known to him. What is it worth? Do you not all of you feel as if the halter were about your necks, as it will be—as it will be?"

"No! no!"

"But I say yes! yes!"

The crew raised shouts of execration against Mr. Suffles, and his arms were securely tied behind him.

"I say yes," added Dolan, if you let this man go. If you do not, why, all I have to say to you, Richards—for I see you looking at me—is, that dead men tell no tales!"

Mr. Suffles looked from face to face now of the threatening men about him. The boats were close to each other, so that there was no difficulty in stepping from one to the other, and Dolan stood by the gangway of the Rift, with Bowline by his side, and then he waved his arm, saying:

"Settle it, my men, how you please. Let him go, and I will take a boat and bid you good night at once. You will find your shares of the plunder and profit of our voyages in hard cash in the two large closets in the inner cavern. I ask nothing of you, if you spare this man, but liberty to put as large a space of land and water as I can between me and this place."

"Death—death to the spy!" cried several.

Then Mr. Suffles began to think that his position was getting rather perilous.

"My good men," he said—and he licked his rapidly parching lips as he spoke—"my good men," I will not betray you. I am no spy; my interests are all the other way. I will not say one word of this place. Why should I?—oh! why should I?"

There was a whispered consultation among the smugglers; and then two of them began to lift from the bottom of the boat some heavy chain-links that were there as ballast, and to run a cord through them to hold them together.

"Stop! stop!" said Mr. Suffles. "My good men—my brave and noble fellows, stop, I beg of you! You are all deceived—deceived by Captain Dolan, who only wants me put out of the way that he may keep the whole of the money to himself, you see. Bless your hearts, all of you! you didn't think of that—ha! ha!—no! no! That didn't strike you; and as for me betraying you, why, it is out of all question. No, no; I like you all too well. I love you all—gallant fellows as you are. Mercy! oh, have mercy upon me, Dolan! Captain Dolan, spare me! I will say anything for my life, I will say you did not have the money. Five hundred pounds for my life—my life!

The smugglers hung the heavy chain-links round his neck like a huge iron necklace. They weighed him down nearly to his knees.

"Mercy! help! I know what this means; you want to drown me. I will keep your secret; I will stay here and join you. I am rich—rich! How much money do you all want?—only say, and save my life!"

"Hold on, Bill!" said one.

"Ay, ay!"

"He'll slip out of it!"

"Not he. That does it."

A twist of the rope was made fast under the arms of Mr. Suffles and the chain links were secured; but in doing that they loosened the cord that held his hands behind his back, and he held them both up imploringly.

"Save me!—oh, save me! Have mercy upon me!"

"Keep him till we all disperse," said Martin. "He cannot do us any harm then. Why take a life uselessly?"

"Thank you! God bless you!" said Mr. Suffles, as he burst into tears. "God bless you!"

"Over with him!" said Dolan.

"No! oh, no! Help! murder! murder! mur—"

The sound was stifled in the sea. There was a shriek and a plunge and Mr. Suffles sank to the bottoin of the heaving waves of the sea cavern.

Mr. Suffles could swim.

Early in the contest, the wordy contest for his life, he had secured in one of his hands a small pocket knife, with the frantic idea of attempting to fight his way out of the cavern. That idea had passed away as being too madly impracticable, but he had kept the knife in his hand.

It was a good friend to him now.

Holding his breath as he dived to the bottom of the sea by virtue of the weight of the chain-links, Mr. Suffles tore open the clasped knife with his teeth and made frantic slashes over his chest with it, in the hope to cut the cord which held the sinking ballast of iron that weighed him down in its place. He cut his clothing and made long slashes in his skin, and then the cord was severed and he was in a moment free of the iron weight.

Up to the surface shot Mr. Snuffles, half suffocated and with a ringing noise in his ears, as if a thousand whistling winds were blowing through the cordage of a navy.

CHAPTER XXIV.

THE OLD LOVE AND THE NEW.

The course of our narrative has compelled us, for a time, to leave the cabin of the Rift and its inhabitants—Captain Mocquet and the fair Marie. It is necessary, now, that we should request the reader's attention to a period antecedent to much that has taken place in the sea cavern.

That period is when the Rift first made its way into the cave and when Gerald was in the cabin of the cutter, soon after Dolan had met with the fright that the supposed apparition of Marie had given him.

Although, for the time, this appearance of Marie had been sufficient to rid Gerald and Captain Mocquet and his daughter of the presence of Dolan, they yet could not but feel their absolute danger so soon as the Rift should get fairly to its moorings in the cavern of the cliff.

Then there would probably be others who would visit the cabin, even if Dolan should lack the courage to do so, and the deep anxiety of Gerald was but temporarily assuaged by this present defeat of Captain Dolan.

The gallant and heroic youth could think but of one course of action that promised any successful result and that the Rift would probably be left to itself, while the crew, with Dolan, would go to dispose of the cargo of the Coquette, to get both Captain Mocquet and his daughter out of the vessel and into the other portion of the caverns and there hide them until some opportunity afforded itself for the escape of them and of himself.

Gerald fully believed, too, that Grace would go with him—for well he knew the horror with which she had begun to regard Dolan.

After the manner in which Captain Dolan had scrambled to the deck of the Rift, upon seeing what he supposed to be the spirit of the young French girl, the little party in the cabin kept a profound silence, for they could not know but the result of his fright might be an inducement to some of the crew to make an examination of the cabin.

If that had ensued, all would have been lost, so far as keeping the existence of Marie a secret, although probably she would have been in no sort of danger.

Yet both Captain Mocquet and Gerald had a feeling approaching to horror of this young and gentle girl being thrown even on the mercy of Dolan and his crew, and they resolved to strain every nerve to keep her in secret in the cabin of the Rift.

It was Gerald who broke the silence after the departure of Captain Dolan.

"Courage—courage, sir," he said. "All is well now. He will not come again—he dare not."

Captain Mocquet held both the hands of Gerald in his own and in broken accents thanked him. Then he spoke with great volubility, in French to Marie, who, with an abundance of little nods of the head and mon Dieus, replied to him. Then she came and sat down by the side of Gerald and held his arm and looked up in his face, while her cheek rested on his shoulder, and with little arch looks and pretty shrugs and smiles, she entered into some long history to him of which he knew nothing but the tones.

"Captain Mocquet," said Gerald, "I do not understand what your dear Marie says."

Captain Mocquet then spoke to Marie and she said something to him, upon which he turned to Gerald, arying:

"The dear child shall say that her heart will speak at your heart, and that the language is—what you call it—n'importe—no thing. Bah! mon cher Gerald, we shall love you over and over."

Marie smiled and repeated the name of Gerald and then her own, as though she would weave them together in her own mind. It was in a soft, singing tone that she did so, and she clung closer to him, and now and then with little pats on his cheek and bright smiles, she courted him to look happy and caressing.

"Gerald, Marie—Marie, Gerald—Gerald, Marie—Marie, Gerald!"

And then the soft voice decreased to perfect whispers and she all but slept upon his breast.

"Captain Mocquet," said Gerald, "Captain Mocquet!"

"Bien!"

"Captain Mocquet, I think I will go on deck."

"You shall be kill then."

"No—no. Will you take Marie?"

Marie heard this—she did not know what the words meant, but there was a little perceptible action on the part of Gerald, as though he wouldn't lift her from him, and she crept away to her father and rested her head upon his lap. Through the quivering lashes of her eyes, though, she looked at Gerald.

"No," said Mocquet, "you will be kill. We will kill or save together—I mean live or death—in la belle France. I am proprietaire, and we shall be happy."

"Well," said Gerald, "I will not go upon deck; but listen, Captain Mocquet, to what I have to say to you. When this vessel reaches a cavern in the cliffs of England, to which it is going, I must try to get help, in order that I may rescue you and Marie."

"Gerald," said Marie, as she heard her own name pronounced, "Marie, Gerald—Gerald, Marie!"

"Then, Captain Mocquet, I will, with my dear sister Grace, who will love Marie—"

"Marie, Gerald—Gerald, Marie!" sang the French girl, in a low tone.

"I will find a means of our leaving the place—for she wishes to leave it—and I, after the events of this voyage, feel that I cannot, longer than is necessary, breathe the same air with Dolan. You understand me, sir?"

"Oui—yes."

"The place we are going to is a cavern in a cliff; it has many strange passages and recesses and there are outlets from it—one that I know of, though they for long kept it secret from me. That one opens by a narrow passage into a ravine or gorge that seems as if the cliff had cracked into two portions and left a deep rent from the upper land to the sea. Wild vegetation grows there—huge leaves of old ferns and some straggling trees; but if we can get to that place I think our escape is but accomplished and we will reach the nearest town and there you will find, no doubt, some one to befriend you."

"Sans doute."

Marie looked and listened and Gerald spoke—still more and more unfolding his plans to Captain Mocquet, until the sharp reports of the guns of the Rift engaged all their attention.

It was that continued firing which the cutter kept up when close to the cliff, so that under cover of the smoke she might make her way into the sea cavern.

Then, from the noises that ensued, Gerald knew perfectly well what was going on and he whispered to Captain Mocquet:

"The Rift is safe and will soon be at anchor in her own little subterranean sea."

Then they heard the chain cable rattle out and the little smuggling vessel swung easily in the sea cavern by one anchor.

It was then that Gerald listened to what was passing above with the most intense interest, and when he heard the voice of Grace he took the hand of Captain Mocquet, sayin?

"Trust me, dear sir, I will soon return to you. Do not leave the Rift, if you can help it, until I see you."

Captain Mocquet kissed Gerald on the cheek, and then, English boy like, he would have shaken hands with Marie; but she put both her arms round his neck and clasped her fingers one in the other, as though she meant them to stay for a while, and she kissed first one of his cheeks and then the other, as she smilingly sang:

"Marie, Gerald—Gerald, Marie!"

Then she gently let him go and shook hands with him and laughed. That light-hearted Marie, who, in the midst of so much peril could sing and laugh!

Gerald did not choose to encounter Dolan on the deck of the Rift. Indeed, he did not know what view Dolan would take of his leaving the Rift at all. Hence was it, then, that he preferred reaching Grace by the cabin window leading to the foot of the little steps leading through the recesses of the caverns to the inhabited portion of that ocean-house.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

A Bachelor's Appeal to Mothers.

BY "BILLY PATTERSON."

I don't object to babies, if you keep 'em in their place;
They are precedent conditions for perpetuating race;
So its philosophic surely,
And a scientific purely
View of matters such as this
To acknowledge that without 'em we'd be very much amiss.

Since Abel was an infant and Cain his mother's joy,
Shem's wife a girl baby, and Ham a baby boy,
Since the mother of Methus'lah could not quite make up her mind
To resemble her or Enoch the darling most inclined,
Since Og, the King of Bashan, and the valiant son of Nun,
And Cush, and Phut, and Canaan, and Peleg, every one,
Was each the perfect "nonesuch" to the fond maternal eye,
And Pharaoh's daughter's tender heart was touched by Moses' cry,
Since Kezia, and Jemima, and Keren-happuch too
Tried patient Job's best patience the weary midnight through,
The infantile phenomenon has still maintained its place,
And so I bow respectfully, if not with perfect grace.

But when I am expected to be very complaisant
To father and to mother of the youthful visitant
In scanty hair, or mindless eye, or shapeless little nose,
Tracing a clear similitude of beautiful repose
To one or other parent or remoter ancestor,
Perchance a purely fabulous, a myth progenitor.

And when I've been persuaded to upraise it in mine arms,
And prompted to expatiate upon its many charms,
To handle it, to dandle it, to fondle, to caress,
Exhibiting the meanwhile a most evident distress,
Perspiring and protesting amidst all mine agony
That heavier baby of its age there really could not be—
Why, then the case is altered, and I wish with all my heart
That babes were kept, and bachelors, three thousand miles apart.

The Twins.

BY HENRY S. LEIGH.

In form and feature, face and limb,
I grew so like my brother,
That folks got taking me for him,
And each for one another.
It puzzled all our kith and kin,
It reached a fearful pitch;
For one of us was born a twin,
And not a soul knew which.

One day to make the matter worse
Before our names were fix'd,
As we were being washed by nurse,
We got completely mix'd;
And thus, you see, by fate's decree
Or rather nurse's whim,
My brother John got christened me,
And I got christened him.

This fatal likeness ever dogg'd
My footsteps when at school,
And I was always getting flogg'd
When John turned out a fool.
I put this question fruitlessly,
To every one I knew,
"What would you do, if you were me,
To prove that you were you?"

Our close resemblance turned the tide
Of my domestic life,
For somehow, my intended bride
Became my brother's wife.
In fact, year after year the same
Absurd mistakes went on,
And when I died the neighbors came
And buried brother John.

The poetess who can make "roast beef" rhyme with "vegetables" is the kind of a poetess the world is waiting to crown as queen.

To remove iron mould and ink from delicate linen fabrics, wet the spots with milk, then cover them with common salt. This should be done before the linen is washed. Another way to take out ink is to dip the spotted part in melted tallow. For very fine articles this is the better way.

The truth may cost many a pang to utter, strict integrity may have to give up many a coveted gain, the courage of principle may forfeit the goodwill so highly prized or the position so eminently desirable; but upon the scale of years they will lead their adherents to a position of honor and happiness compared with which all that had been sacrificed seems utterly trivial.

Kerosene oil should be kept for use in air-tight, closed vessels. A large quantity is best kept in a well-corked can provided with a faucet an inch or two from the bottom so that the oil can be drawn off as required without disturbing the sediment which usually collects in the bottom of the vessel. The oil for daily use should be kept in a small can, kept corked at the neck and spout. If either cork be left out for a day or two, the oil will burn dull and cake in the wick, especially if the kerosene is kept in a warm place.

RUSSIAN LOCOMOTIVE CAR.—Much interest has been excited among engineers by the construction, under the direction of the Russian government, of some locomotive cars of a special type for the Transcaspian railway, and built so as to meet two difficulties, viz., the waterless character of a large section of the line, and the insignificant ordinary traffic. To meet the former the locomotive car is provided with tanks containing sufficient water to last seventy miles; and, as the waterless stretch from Michaelovsk to Kazantchik is about fifty miles in length, this supply is amply sufficient under any contingencies that may occur. With regard to the second difficulty, the locomotive is constructed with a car connected to it and capable of conveying eighty passengers. The locomotive car is warmed by the exhaust steam from the engine, by which arrangement an important economy in the consumption of fuel results.

DISINFECTION OF CLOTHING.—The disinfection of articles of clothing, dwellings, and utensils has been shown to be a most important matter after or during infectious disease. Dr. Parsons, of England, has just returned a most suggestive report on the use of heat as such an efficient agent. Diseases are transmitted either by germs or their spores, and it has been shown that the latter are destroyed with far the greater difficulty. Thus, the microbes of splenic fever are killed on exposure to a temperature of dry heat varying from 212° to 218° F., but their spores do not yield after two hours at 220° F.; one hour at 245° F., however, destroys them also. Another remarkable feature developed by Dr. Parsons was the difference between dry and moist heat. Thus, a thermometer rolled up in flannel and placed in an oven at 212° F. showed only 130° F. after one hour. If the oven was filled with moist air, however, the hot air rapidly permeated the flannel. These two facts are of prime importance in properly managing all schemes for disinfection by heat.

Why She Ought to Take a Fan With Her.

"Are you going to take your fan with you, to the ball, Araminta?"

"No."

"Well, I think you ought to."

"What's the use? There is not too much heat in the house at this season."

"But I should think you would want something to cover yourself with after you take off your cloak."

Buying a Present.

Young lady (in book store)—"A volume of poetry, please."

"Yes, ma'am. Er—what author?"

Young Lady—"Oh, I don't care anything acout the author, but the cover must harmonize with a cherry parlor table with a red plush top."

Their Sister's Advantages.

Two little girls, aged four years, were quarreling, when one said:

"I don't tare; I dess my sister has a nice yed shawl."

"I don't tare, neider," retorted the other. "I dess my sister's beau has a yedder nose dan your sister's yed shawl."

A Woman who has Trained Several Husbands.

We've been talking with a woman who has trained several husbands, and is now a candidate for another trial as a good wife. She makes some observations, gained from her varied experiences, that are valuable, and, as this is the bridal season, we think, timely.

She says it is easy enough to win a husband; it is more difficult to keep him. That any attractive little dumpling with bright eyes and a coaxing voice may gather in a noble husband.

She insists that noble husbands are thicker than red roses on a toboggan slide, but it takes a master hand to draw out that nobility and keep it at home.

It requires soothing, she says, but if the wife understands her business she can direct things so that her husband will think it delicious when she asks him to bring up a scuttle of coal or get up in the middle of the night to kill a burglar. She says it is useless to try to describe the magic power a devoted wife may exercise over her husband. Her logic contends that there is something in the great, rough, earnest nature of a man that can be won quicker and easier with gentleness and tender steak than by a bilious course of broom-handle reasoning with bread and milk diet.

A husband with such a wife will not think that, because he gets up to warm the baby's milk near the fire, or to look for burglars, and is otherwise obedient, it is because he has no backbone. It is simply because he is the husband of the woman of whom he ought to be and is proud.

Young ladies, if you expect to marry—and of course you do—you must draw your own conclusions. This widow is certainly a clever woman. She is not especially a sweet-minded woman, nor a superior creature. She simply studies her husbands, learns all their idiosyncrasies, and acts with affectionate discrimination.

A Very Thoughtful Husband.

Smith—"It s getting late; I must go, for I am expected to be at home now."

Jones—"Don't be in a hurry. Your wife told my wife this morning that she was going ten miles into the country and would stay all night with her mother."

Smith—"Then I must go at once."

Jones—"What's the use? Who will expect you?"

Smith—"The hired girl. She gets very lonesome when my wife and I are both away."

Gas as a Measure of Love.

"Rebecca, I ton'd vish dot you should keep gompany mit dot Igey Eisenheim some more."

"Vhy, fader, Igey vas a wery nice young man?"

"Dat is wery drue put you don't lofe Igey truly und besides der gas pills vas higher as dey vas for dwo vinters vile you vas keeping gompany mit Moses Schoeffensdadt. You lofed Moses more as Igey. Dot gas pill never fails. I dink it vas better of you keep gompany mit Moses. Times is pooty hard."

The Wrong Book.

"Have you broken off with Miss Smythe, De Robinson?"

"Not exactly. She broke off with me."

"How did it happen?"

"Through no fault of mine, you may be sure. Her father is worth half a million."

"How was it, old fellow?"

"Well, I heard her express a wish to read a certain book of poems, so I called around to the bookstore and ordered it sent up to the house. The next evening I dropped in to see if she had received it."

"And she had, I suppose?"

"A servant handed me a small package and informed me that Miss Smythe was indisposed."

"And the package contained?"

"A briefly-worded note of dismissal and the book sent up by that ass of a dealer."

"The book you purchased?"

"Not to any visible extent. The package contained a volume entitled: 'Useful Hints for Ugly Girls.'"

She Gnawed.

"Talking of temper," said the quiet man in the circle, "I can tell you a remarkable case of how a bad temper was kept under. When I was first married, a good many years ago, I noticed that when my wife got angry she never said anything, but at once disappeared into the cellar. One day I followed her, and what do you think she was doing?"

"Praying?" suggested one.

"No. She was gnawing a post that supports the house."

"And it cured her?" from several.

"Wait until you hear. Ah, it revives sad memories," murmured the quiet man. "One day she gnawed the post through and the house fell into the cellar."

"And buried her in the ruins?" from a chorus of voices simultaneously.

"No," he answered meekly; then he added in a tired voice, "She has never gnawed a post since."

Sympathetic silence.

Artemesia Agricultural Society.
The annual meeting of this Society was held in Flesherton on Thursday the 13th inst. Although the day was cold and stormy there was a fair turnout of the members. the auditors report showed the total receipts during the past year to be $415.76 disbursements $322 63 leaving a balance on hand of $92.93. Of the total receipts $75.75 was collected for a new plowing match of which $65.94 was expended for that purpose, leaving $9.81 as a start for another year. The following were elected officers for 1887:

Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge to all who desire it, this receipe, in German, French or English, with full directions for preparing and using. An exchange asks, "How can we prevent mice from gnawing bark off fruit trees?" Kill the mice of course. A dead mouse never gnaws bark.

THE DEAF MADE TO HEAR.—"After eight years suffering from deafness so bad that I was unable to attend to my business, I was cured by the use of Hagyard's Yellow Oil. With gratitude I make this known for the benefit of others afflicted." Harry Ricardo, Toronto.

"What overall material will last th longest?" asked a woman of a tailor. "Sod," said the tailor, grimly.

THREATENED DANGER.—In the fall of '84, Randall Miller, of Maitland, N. S., was prostrated to his bed with an attack of incipient consumption. Cough remedies had failed. He rapidly grew abilitated, and friends despaired of his recovery He tried Burdock Blood Bitters, with immediate relief, followed with a speedy cure.

Which is the most enduring trade? A cobbler's, because it is ever-lasting, and the soul is at the bottom of it all.

A LUCKY ESCAPE, Mrs. Cyrus Kilborne, of Beamsville, Ont., had what was thought to be a cancer on her nose, and was about to submit to a cancer doctor's operation, when she tried Burdock Blood Bitters which effacted a radical cure. This medicine cures all blood diseases.

We are never satisfied that a lady understands a kiss unless we have it of her own lips.

HEPWORTH, 6th May, 1886.
I can say with confidence that I derived very great relief from Dr. Jug's Medecine. I had been ill for over five months with congestion of the lungs and was reduced to a very low ebb, when a friend induced me to try this medicine. I received very great benefit from it and attribute my rapid recovery in a great measure to its effects.

DEATHS.
BOWERS.—At his son William's residence Grenfell, Simcoe Co. on the 15th inst., Mr. John Bowers aged 71 years. Deceased was born in Eberston, Yorkshire, England, and was one of the first residents of Markdale, long before it had a name.

To the Editor of the STANDARD.
Shrewd observers have frequently remarked "that the transition from the sublime to the "ridiculous is by no means violent; and that "extremes invariably meet;" from which we deduce the following axioms,
1 Between the wisdom of the "unco" wise and the folly of the hare-brained simpleton it is difficult to draw the line.
2 From the "dizzy heights" of grotesque presumption to the "lower depths" of drivelling imbecility the descent is imperceptible.
Taking these proverbs and axioms as my text I proceed sir with your premission to call the attention of your readers to the following piece of choice literature which was presented to the last annual meeting of our Public School.
"Moved by G. S. Bowes seconded by Wilson "Benson—Resolved that the Bible in whole "(without mutilation) be and is hereby authorized to be read in each department of our "schools, as we consider that the Bible is the "birthright of every child attending the "Public Schools in Ontario and it is our "bounden duty to have the Bible—the ground "work of our faith, placed in the hands of "our children in the public schools".—Carried.
Now Mr. Edior dont forget, and let the public bear in mind, that Geo. Spier Bowes, and Wilson Benson and the other half dozen empty-heads who said amen, have "resolved" that the Bible "be and is hereby authorized." Just think of that, and fear and quake all you who dissent henceforth the Bible is "authorized" by the supreme Junta above named and wo to them who dare in the face of the authority aforesaid disobey.
The Bible is now "authorized' and we may be thankful that the authority aforesaid hath generously condescended to give reasons for this important step "we consider the Bible is "the birthright of every child attending the "public school of Ontario" and therefore we decree that the Bible "be and is hereby "authorized" to be used in all our schools "and it is our boundeu duty to have the Bible "placed in the hands of our children in the public schools."
Here! Here!! But Sir why do these high-falutin plylanthropists stop with the "children "of Ontario" and why do they confiine themselves to that fraction thereof attending the public schools?"
Why should the Bible be considered the birthright of these more than the children of any other country? Henceforth let us hope they will include in their cosmopolitan grasp the children of the entire human family of every creed, color and nationality; for hath not "God made of one blood all nations &c."
Next time therefore that the Junta set about "authorizing" I would respectfully suggest that they do not confie their labours to Ontario but that they boldly invade the "religions beyond" and thereby "without mutilation" Biblify the whole earth at one fiat.

THE Carnival Number which is being issued this week by the Montreal Witness, will, we believe, command a most unprecedented sale, as it is published at the extremely low price of 15 cents, or two copies for 25 cents—all free of post. It is to contain 24 pages, literally crowded with excellent colored pictures and engravings of the principle scenes of the Carnival, correctly as well as beautifully executed. The idea of sending two copies at such a reduction is a capital one; everybody can afford to buy one copy to keep, and at least one other to send to friends at a distance.

FOUR YEARS SUFFERING.—Mrs. Torrance McNash, of Smith's Falls, Ont., after four years of intense suffering with scrofula, from which her head became bald, was cured by Burdock Blood Bitters after the best medical aid had failed.

THE townships of Glenelg, Artemesia and Euphrasia have each appointed the same men as auditors that they employed last year. This is not only a high recommendation to the men chosen, but is an evidence of wisdom on the part of the council board's, as we contend that, other things being equal, the man of experience has a decided advantage. Those elected as above are, for Artemesia—Messrs Thos, Boland and Henry Meldrum; Glenelg—A. Turner and John Nichol; Euphrasia—J. L, Wilson and W. H. Dodson. The same rule will hold good in all positions but perhaps none to such an extent as in township assessors.

A most inhuman act was perpetrated by some of our Euphrasia neighbors last Saturday night, a miserable poor horse in their possession happened to slip and fall on the road, a short distance past the Roller Rink, after attempting in vain to get the animal up they went and left it to suffer and shiver and freeze in the ditch, in this condition it was found in the morning still lingering between life and death, The police were called upon and immediately ordered its destruction. As the law makes provision for the punishment of such deserving people they should not be allowed to escape.

HYMENEAL.—One of the most pleasant events of the season took place last Wednesday Dec 22nd at the residence of Mr. John Fleming J. P. (late of Berkeley Ontario) when his youngest daughter Miss Martha Elizabeth Fleming and Mr. Joseph Mack of Montreal were united in the bonds of matrimony by the Rev. Mr. Fotheringham. About sixty guests were present and a most enjoyable time was spent, music, dancing &c., were the order of the evening. A duet by Mr. and Miss Linnell and songs by Mrs. W. Clarke being greatly appreciated. Speeches suitable to the occasion were delivered by Mr. Thomas Fleming and J. P. Dill. The presents to the bride were numerous and attractive and show how well "Martha" is respected by the friends she is leaving. Mr. Editor we will now close by wishing the happy couple long life peace and prosperity.—[Regina Leador.

A RARE TREAT.—Miss McGarrie was greeted with a full house in Markdale on Monday evening last, all of whom were delighted with the entertainment. Her powers of expression are wonderful, and her appearanco is every way in her favor, delicate, modest, wholly free from affectation, self-possessed, a fascenating smile, and each movement as graceful as art can compel, she appears so perfectly natural in every part of a varied program that her art is not perceived by those who listen. She excels in humerous selections, and can move the audience to tears or laughter at pleasure. Her elocution is faultless, which is saying a great deal. Such a treat is indeed rare in rural districts, and if Miss McGarry should give another in the near future in Markdale she will receive an enthusiastic reception.

SIR,—I notice in the "STANDARD" some two or three times that there are two Young Liberal Clubs in Markdale. Now there is only one "Young Men's Liberal Club" here, the other is "Liberal Conservative" a term which has been compared by one of Canada's best statesmen to the Neuter Gender, a barren and unfruitful race. We can see something to respect in the good old Conservative gentleman, but how can we respect borrowed plumes.

YOUNG LIBERAL.

Markdale, Feb. 1st 1887.

[The above is a direct contradiction to the truth, as the wrighter is doubtless well aware. There are two distinct associations in this place, one by the name of "Young Men's Liberal Club" and one the "Young Men's Liberal Conservative Club." It would be a better omen if young Liberal would exhibit a more LIBERAL spirit. Ed. STANDARD.]

WHAT TRUE MERIT WILL DO.

The unprecedented sale of Boschee's German Syrup within a few years, has astonished the world. It is without doubt the safest and best remedy ever discovered for the speedy and effectual cure of Coughs, Colds and the severest Lung troubles. It acts in an entirely different principle from the usual prescriptions given by Physicians, as it does not dry up the Cough and leave thee diseas still in the system, but on the contrary removes the cause of the trouble, heals the part affected and leaves them in a purely healthy condition. A bottle kept in the house for use when the disease make their appearance, will save doctor's bills and a long spell of serious illness. A trial will convince you of these facts. It is positively sold by all druggists and general in the land Price 75 cts., large bottles. E. O. W.

A WONDERFUL ORGAN.—The largest organ and one that plays a controlling part on the health of the body is the liver. If torpid or inactive the whole system becomes diseased. Dr. Chase's Liver Cure is made specially for Liver and Kidney diseases, and is guaranteed to cure. Receipe book and medicine $1. Sold by all Druggists.

HEALTH.

Vegetables and Health.

A vegetable diet is 400 or 500 per cent. cheaper than the same amount of food derived from the flesh of animals.

The animals which for power of endurance and rapidity of motion are valued for our service derive the whole of their strength and nutriment from the vegetable kingdom; such as the horse, the elephant, the camel.

The physical condition of many flesh eaters shows that the blood itself is loaded with impurities and is in a state of decomposition, and that persons whose blood is in this impure state are liable, on very slight exposure, chill, etc., to be attacked with dangerous illness. That this condition is caused by flesh eating is shown from the fact that it is quickly changed by the adoption of a vegetable diet.

The flesh eating habits of the so-called civilized world render necessary the setting apart of a whole class of men for the performance of the degrading and brutalizing office of slaughtering animals for food.

Were it not for the large quantities of vegetables consumed by flesh eaters disease would ensue in every case. Vegetables supply the salts of the blood.

The peasantry of all nations abstain from animal food—wholly or in part—from necessity. Their vigor is greater than that of any other class in every country.

Meat is the most costly of all foods, and among civilized races the struggle for life rages to so fearful an extent that human beings shorten life by the effort they make to save it.

The average age of man should be a century. The majority of human beings die before they are half as old. The longest lived are those who feed on cereals.

Vegetarian diet, by contributing to the physical health of man, improves likewise his moral condition, besides conducing in no small degree to the healthy development of the intellectual faculties; since it must naturally follow that by rendering the instrument clear and pure, the acts of life will be materially elevated, also being identified with that which is clear and pure.—Laura C. Holloway in "Buddhists' Diet Book."

Croup.

Every mother, indeed every woman in the family, should know how to treat croup in its beginning, so that instant aid may be given, especially where a physician is not close at hand. Croup is very insidious in its approaches, and occurs chiefly in the winter and spring. Among its symptoms are a peculiar hoarseness, attended by a hoarse cough observable for some days, and in some cases only a few hours before the paroxysm, which occurs usually at night. In the morning the child often seems better, but this should not deceive the mother. Before the disorder progresses to the characteristic wheezing, hoarse cough, emetics should be administered promptly and a hot foot bath given, but great care should be taken to avoid chill. Syrup of ipecac is an excellent remedy, antimonial wine being a depressing nauseant. Ipecac should always be at hand in a house where there are children subject to croup, and such children should always wear flannel next the skin.

Health Notes.

Gingerbread made with oatmeal instead of flour is a very useful aperient for children.

To stop bleeding at the nose place a small roll of paper or muslin above the front teeth, under the upper lip, and press hard on the same.

MILK AS A PREVENTIVE.—A red-lead manufacturer of France, has discovered that the use of milk at their meals, which he has made obligatory on his workmen to the extent of one litre daily, preserves those employed in lead-works from any symptoms of lead-disease.

A simple home remedy for croup is alum and sugar. The way to use it is to take a knife or a grater, and shave off in small particles about a teaspoonful of alum; mix this with twice its amount of sugar to make it palatable, and administer it as quickly as possible. Almost instantaneous relief will follow.

A leading Berlin physician, a Prof. Franzel, has lately advanced the theory that those who must smoke cigars had better smoke the cheap brands. He claims to have discovered that it is the higher priced tobacco that causes heart disease, so often complained of by excessive smokers. Those who smoke cheap cigars are rarely injured by them.

Earache is usually caused by a sudden cold. Steam the head over hot herbs, bathe the feet in hot water, and put into the ear cotton-wool dipped in camphor and sweet oil. This treatment is often excellent for faceache and toothache. The latter is frequently entirely relieved by placing the cotton soaked with camphor in the ear on the side where the painful tooth is. It is a good plan also to tie a kerchief over the ear, for earache, or toothache, or faceache.

To select a room for a sick person, care should be taken to have it exposed to as little external noise as possible, as impressions made on the ear greatly influence the nervous system. Likewise select a spacious, well ventilated apartment, that has in it no unnecessary furniture. Great care is necessary in regulating the light of a sick-room, although it is not often necessary to exclude all light. The rule is, a strong light stimulates the action of the brain, while a moderate light is soothing to it.

Deafness and unimpaired hearing are frequently caused by an accumulation of hardened wax upon the external surface of the drum of the ear. Never attempt to remove this with the head of a pin or a hair pin. As an eminent doctor of Paris once remarked to one of his patients, "a man should never put anything in his ear smaller than his elbow." Wax and foreign substances can nearly always be removed by dropping into the ear a few drops of olive oil, a little warm, and, after letting it remain a while, syringing the ear with warm soap suds.

Many persons on coming from church complain of headache. This is caused by the action of the impure blood on the brain, due to the accumulation of carbolic acid gas in the air of poorly ventilated churches. The pernicious effect upon the brain and nervous system is very aptly illustrated by the drowsy, listless attitude of the scholars in a poorly ventilated school room as compared with the bright and animated appearance of the children in a neighboring room that has been carefully ventilated. Careful attention to the ventilation of churches and schools will prevent much of the inattention and sleepiness that is observed during the afternoon services or sessions.

Astonishing the Natives.

To the many stories of the effect which the wonders of science and invention have produced in the minds of savages an exchange adds the following:

Signor d' Albertio, the Italian explorer, in his work describing his researches in New Guinea, relates how, having been robbed by the Papuans, he succeeded, without bloodshed, in so thoroughly frightening the natives that they were glad to make peace with him on any terms. He hoisted a black flag over his house, issued a proclamation that while it was flying no one should approach on pain of death, laid Orsini bombs in every direction and fired at every one who passed that way until they were in a state of complete terror.

Two of the leaders, Naimi Kupe and Param, made overtures of peace and brought to Signor d'. Albertio a number of the stolen articles. He thus describes the interview:

"To impress more firmly on their minds how much they had to fear from me, I treated them to several spectacles. The first was to drive three balls in succession into the trunk of a tree one hundred meters distant; the second was to let off an Orsini bomb; and the third, after having induced them to break their lances on a blade of iron, to send it to pieces with a ball from my fowling-piece. But the last spectacle was the finest.

After having kept the two for some time seated on a great rock in front of the house. I led them to a distance, went into the house, and set fire to a train of powder connected with a mine bored under the rock on which they had been seated; then I joined them and directed their attention to the spot.

While they were looking the mine exploded. Needless to say how frightened they were. They had neither legs to run away nor feet to stand, and were hardly able to pray me not to destroy them, and they would recover for me all that I had lost.

When they grew calm I conducted them to see the effect of the mine. The rock was broken in a thousand fragments, and scattered great distances, and instead of the rock on which they had sat they found only a hole. They looked at each other tremblingly, and again entreated me not to kill them. Naimi asked permission to take away a bit of the fractured iron to frighten his people into a restitution of the stolen goods, and as they descended they gathered fragments of the rock."

SCIENTIFIC AND USEFUL.

Atropine is stated to be an antidote to fungus-poisoning.

The general conclusion to be drawn from hatters' figures is favourable to the opinion that large heads and mental capacity go together.

Plaster busts and statuettes may be cleaned by dipping them into thick liquid cold starch—that is, clear starch mixed with cold water—then drying them; and, when the starch is brushed off, the dirt comes off with it.

The balance of evidence, says the Lancet, would appear to be in favour of the conclusion that where a close scrutiny fails to discover any heritable weakness, neurotic or otherwise, consanguincous marriage per se is not necessarily a thing to be prohibited.

For delicate work, such as cementing silks for fans, &c., the following cement is much used by the Japanese: Take best finely-ground rice-flour, mixed with a little cold water, and then pour on boiling water till of proper consistence. Then transfer, to a clean enamelled saucepan and boil two minutes, stirring vigorously. This is far superior to the cements generally used, and when well made almost transparent.

All women who are in the habit of making for themselves a cup of tea are warned against the careless habit of leaving any tea in the tea-pot to be "warmed over," or to be taken cold at an hour much later than when it was made. The tannin which tea that has been long standing contains does a great deal of mischief. A little weak tea newly made with freshly boiled water is not hurtful taken once or twice a day, but strong tea, or tea that has been standing, is decidedly injurious.

Contentment.

An eccentric, wealthy gentleman stuck up a board in a field upon his estate, upon which was printed, the following:

"I will give this field to any man who is contented."

He soon had an applicant.

"Well, sir, are you a contented man?"

"Yes, sir, very."

"Then what do you want of my field?"

The applicant did not stop to reply.

YOUNG FOLKS.

"Tasso."

BY NORA LAUGHER, TORONTO.

I had a great, big doggie once,
His coat was black as jet.
And curly, too, like Persian lamb,
'Twas only straight when wet.

His name was Tasso, and one day
When going home from school,
I fell from off the wooden bridge
Into a deep, dark pool.

Then Tasso—brave old dog he was—
Leaped in, dived deep, and rose
To drag me safely on the bank,
His teeth grasping my clothes.

But I had fainted, and he thought
That I was dead, so he Ran swiftly off unto my home,
And howled so mournfully

That mother came to see what ailed
The dog, and then he tried
To make her know that she at once
Must hasten to my side.

Backwards and forwards Tasso ran
Until he reached the bank,
Where mother found me, senseless still,
All wet, and cold, and dank.

From that day Tasso never heard
Words otherwise than mild,
For he had, by his thoughtful act,
Rescued the little child.

And when the brave old doggie died,
Some bitter tears were shed;
We placed a stone upon his grave,
With the words "Tasso is dead."

"A Darling."

Two gentlemen friends who had been parted for years met in a crowded city thoroughfare. The one who lived in the city was on his way to meet a pressing business engagement. After a few expressions of delight, he said:

"Well, I'm off. I'm sorry, but it can't be helped. I will look for you to-morrow at dinner. Remember, at two o'clock, sharp. I'm anxious for you to see my wife and child."

"Only one child?" asked the other.

"Only one—a daughter," came the answer, tenderly. "She's a darling, I do assure you."

And then they parted, the stranger in the city getting into a street-car bound for the Park, whither he desired to go.

After a block or two, a group of five girls entered the car; they were all young, and evidently belonged to families of wealth and culture, that is, intellectual culture—as they conversed well. Each carried a very elaborately-decorated lunch-basket; each was attired in a very becoming spring suit. Doubtless, they, too, were going to the Park for a spring pic-nic. They seemed very happy and amiable, until the car again stopped, this time letting in a pale-faced girl of about eleven, and a sick boy of four. These children were shabbily dressed, and upon their faces there were looks of distress mingled with some expectancy. Were they, too, on their way to the Park? The gentleman thought so; so did the group of girls, for he heard one of them say, with a look of disdain:

"I suppose those ragamuffins are on an excursion, too."

"I shouldn't want to leave my door if I had to look like that. Would you?" This from another girl.

"No indeed! But there is no accounting for tastes. I think there ought to be a special line of cars for the lower classes."

All this conversation went on in a low tone, but the gentleman had heard it. Had the child too? He glanced at the pale face, and saw tears glistening in the eyes. Then he looked at the group of finely-dressed girls, who had moved as far from the plebeian as the limits of the car would allow. He was angry. He longed to tell them that they were vain and heartless, as they drew their costly trappings closer about them, as if fearful of contact with poverty's children.

Just then an exclamation, "Why, there is Nettie! I wonder where she is going?" caused him to look out upon the corner, where a sweet-faced young girl stood beckoning to the car driver. When she entered the car she was warmly greeted by the five, and they made room for her beside them. They were profuse in their exclamations and questions.

"Where are you going?" asked one.

"O what lovely flowers? Who are they for?" questioned another.

"I'm on my way to Belle Clark's. She's sick you know, and the flowers are for her."

She answered both questions at once, and then glancing toward the door of the car, she saw the pale girl looking wistfully at her. She smiled at the child, a tender look beaming from her beautiful eyes; and then, forgetting that she, too, wore a handsome velvet skirt and costly jacket, and that her shapely hands were covered with well-fitting gloves, she left her seat and crossed over to the little ones, she laid one hand caressingly on the boy's thin cheek as she asked interestedly of the sister:

"The little boy is sick, is he not? And he is your brother, I am sure; he clings so to you."

It seemed hard for the girl to answer, but finally she said:

"Yes, miss; he is sick. Freddy never has been well. Yes, miss, he is my brother. We're goin' to the Park to see if it won't make Freddy better."

"I am glad you are going," the young girl replied in a low voice meant for no one's ears except those of the child addressed. "I feel sure it will do him good; it is lovely there, with the spring flowers all in bloom. But where is your lunch? You ought to have a lunch after so long a drive."

Over the little girl's face came a flush.

"Yes, miss, mebbe we ought to, for Freddy's sake; but you see, we didn't have any lunch to bring. Tim—he's our brother—he saved these pennies purpose so as Freddy could ride to the Park and back. I guess mebbe Freddy'll forget about bein' hungry when he gets to the beautiful Park."

Were there tears in the lovely girl's eyes as she listened? Yes, there certainly were; and very soon she asked the girl where they lived, and wrote the address down in a tablet, which she took from a beaded bag upon her arm.

After riding a few blocks the pretty girl left the car, but she had not left the little ones comfortless. Half the bouquet of violets and hyacinths were clasped in the sister's hand, while the sick boy, with radiant face held in his hand a precious package, from which he helped himself now and then, saying to his sister in a jubilant whisper:

"She said we could eat 'em all—every one—when we got to the Park. What made her so sweet and good to us? She didn't call us ragamuffins, and wasn't 'fraid to have her dress touch ours? and she called me 'a dear' she did. What made her?"

And Sue whispered back:

"I guess it's 'cause she's beautiful as well as her clothes—beautiful inside, you know."

The gentleman's ears served him well. He heard Sue's whisper and thought:

"Yes, the child is right; the lovely young girl is beautiful inside—beautiful in spirit. She is one of the Lord's own, developing in Christian growth. Bless her!"

When the Park was reached the five girls hurried out with laughter and merry talk. Then the gentleman lifted the little boy in his arms and carried him out of the car, across the road and into the green, sweet smelling Park, the sister, with heart full of gratitude following. It was he who paid for a nice ride for them in the goat carriage. He also treated them to oyster soup at the Park restaurant.

At two o'clock sharp the next day the two gentlemen, as agreed, met again.

"This is my wife," the host said, proudly introducing a comely lady, "and this," as a young girl of fifteen entered the parlor, "is my daughter, Nettie."

"Ah?" thought the guest, as he extended his hand in cordial greeting, "this is the dear girl whom I met yesterday in the street-car. I don't wonder her father calls her a darling and no mistake, bless her!"

Scotland.

BY MAUD L. RADFORD.

Oh Scotland, dear, bonnie, Scotland,
With thy fields of heather gay,
And lovely purple, hazy hills,
Where softly the breezes play.

I love thee! I love thee! Scotland,
Though not for thyself alone,
'Tis for another's sake, though thou
Art loveable for thine own.

I love thee for his sake, Scotland;
I think how we used to play
On thy bonny, clear, crystal burns
Many and many a day.

He used to call me his wee wife,
And say that we'd married be
And live like happy birdies, for
I loved him, and he loved me.

And, as the years flew quickly by,
We loved each other still,
And walked by the burn where we'd played
Or strayed near the sunny hill.

We were very, very happy then,
In those days of long ago,
We'd no thought of care, or sorrow,
We'd no thought of pain or woe.

But a sad time came. We parted,
And I crossed the deep blue sea,
But I still was cheered, for letters
Came from thee, Scotland, to me.

They came with loving messages
My sorrowing heart to cheer,
They said that he would be with me
Before the close of the year.

He came with the happy New Year,
And then I became his bride,
And a nobler husband than he,
There's not in the world so wide.

And we'll go back to thee, Scotland,
And we'll part from thee no more,
Till we've crossed the crystal river,
And have reached the golden shore

The German Emperor.

Is there to be a general war in the spring? Those who claim to have the best means of knowing say that there will be. One great hindrance in the way is said to be the old Emperor of Germany, who has had his fill of wars, and wishes no more during his time. That hindrance, however, may turn out a very feeble one when put in opposition to the currents which set so strongly in the other direction. And in any case that life may easily and speedily be cut off. When a man gets to his ninetieth year he may drop off at any moment in spite of his having had a healthy frame and been carefully watched over by the most skilful of doctors. The Emperor's life has not only been long, but full of romance and incident. He will complete his 90th year on the 22nd of March next. He was a soldier in the great German rising against the First Napoleon in 1813. He took his chances, and did his work in the battle of Waterloo. Since that time he has been more or less a prominent character in European politics. Before the popular uprisings of 1848 he was one of the keenest supporters of absolutism, and on that account had to flee to England during the short success of that Revolution, he came to the throne of Prussia in 1861, and at his coronation put the crown upon his own head declaring that he reigned by the favor of God and of no one else. He has ever since been true to his absolute notions, and has managed, through his great minister, Bismarck, to stave off the great contest between feudal authority and modern ideas, which will come even in Germany very shortly after he has finally made his bow. How the old man roughed it during the Franco-Prussian war, and how he was at last crowned Emperor of Germany in the palace of the French Kings at Versailles on the 18th of January, 1871, is known to every one. He will be missed by some and honored by all when he goes over to the majority, and then in all likelihood there will be a new order of things, for his son and his son's wife have very different ideas from his, and neither of them trust or love Bismarck as the father has done.

Service.

The servant, man or woman, who begins negotiation for service by inquiring what privileges are attached to the offered situation, and whose energy is put chiefly in stipulations, reservations, and conditions to "lessen the burden" of the place, will not be found worth the hiring. There is only one spirit that ever achieves a great success. The man who seeks only how to make himself most useful, whose aim is to render himself indispensable to his employer, whose whole being is animated with the purpose to fill the largest possible place in the walk assigned to him, has in the exhibition of that spirit the guarantee of success. The man who is afraid of doing too much is near of kin to him who seeks to do nothing. They are neither of them in the remotest degree a relation to the man whose willingness to do everything possible to his touch places him at the head of the active list.

Her Challenge.

The maiden sat so near my arm,
Around her waist I threw it,
And then, not wearing any harm,
I kissed her e'er she knew it.

She threw an angry glance at me,
Her face grew red, and then
She frowned and said, "I'd like to see
You just try that again!"

"Why certainly sweet maid," I said,
I did—could I be blamed?
This time she only blushed and said,
"You ought to be ashamed!"

NOBLE MOTHERS.

Great Men Who Owed Much to Their Mothers' Love.

In reading the biographies of great men we are often struck by the love they had for their mothers, to whom they attributed all their greatness. Curran spoke with great affection of his mother, as a woman of strong original understanding, to whose wise counsel, consistent piety, and lessons of honorable ambition, which she diligently enforced on the minds of the children, he himself principally attributed his success in life. "The only inheritance," he used to say, "that I could boast of from my poor father was the very scanty one of an unattractive face or person, like his own; and if the world has ever attributed to me something more valuable than face or person or than earthly wealth, it was because another and a dearer parent gave her child a portion from the treasure of her mind." De Maistre described his "sublime mother" as "an angel to whom God had lent a body for a brief season." He said that her noble character made all other women venerable in his eyes.

"Happy he
With such a mother! Faith in womankind
Beats with his blood, and trust in all things high
Comes easy to him, and though he trip and fall,
He shall not blind his soul with clay."

George Washington was only eleven years of age—the eldest of five children—when his father died. The widowed mother had her children to educate and bring up, a large household to govern and extensive estates to manage, all of which she accomplished with complete success. Her good sense, tenderness, industry and vigilance enabled her to overcome every obstacle; and, as the richest reward of her solicitude and toil, she had the happiness to see all her children come forward with a fair promise into life, filling the places allotted to them in a manner equally honorable to themselves, and to the parent who had been the only guide of their principles, conduct and habits. Mrs. Washington used daily to gather her little flock around her to read to them lessons of Christian religion and morality, and her little manual in which she wrote the maxims which guided her was preserved by her son and consulted by him as among his most precious treasures.

A mother's love is always a sacred instinct but for it to become the strength and blessing it may be to the children, the mother herself must have a strong, holy, and well-disciplined character, like that of the mother of the Wesleys. She was very beautiful, and was married at nineteen to a country clergyman. She bore him nineteen children. To the end of her long life her sons, especially John, looked up to her and consulted her as the best friend and wisest counsellor they could have. The home over which Mrs. Wesley ruled was free and happy, and full of healthful play as any home in the holidays, and yet orderly and full of healthful work as any school. The "odious noise" of the crying of children was not suffered, but their was no restraint on their gleeful laughter. She had many wise rules which she kept to steadily. One of these was to converse alone with one of her little ones every evening, listening to their childish confessions, and giving counsel in their childish perplexities. She was the patient teacher as well as the cheerful companion of her children. When some one said to her "Why do you tell that blockhead the same thing twenty times over?" she replied, "Because if I had told him only nineteen times I should have lost all my labor." So deep was the hold this mother had on the hearts of her sons, that in his early manhood she had tenderly to rebuke John, for that "fond wish of his, to die before she died." It was through the bias given by her to her sons' minds in religious matters that they acquired the tendency which, even in early years, drew to them the name of Methodists. In a letter to her son Samuel, when a scholar at Westminster, she said: "I would advise you as much as possible to throw your business into a certain method, by which means you will learn to improve every precious moment, and find an unspeakable facility in the performance of your respective duties." This "method" she went on to describe, exhorting her son, "in all things to act upon principle;" and the society which the brothers John and Charles afterward founded at Oxford is supposed to have been in a great measure the result of her exhortations.

Words in the English Language.

By actual enumeration of the words contained in the best dictionaries, it has been ascertained that 13,330 English words are of Saxon origin and 29,354 of classical origin. In consequence of the popular nature of the Teutonic words in the language, the Saxon element largely preponderates in the works of our greatest writers. The pronouns, numerals, prepositions, and auxiliary verbs, the names of the elements and their changes, of the seasons, the heavenly bodies, the divisions of time, the features of natural scenery, the organs of the body, the modes of bodily action and posture, the commonest animals, the words used in earliest childhood, the ordinary terms of traffic, the constituent words in proverbs, the designation of kindred, the simpler emotions of the mind, terms of pleasantry, satiire, contempt, indignation, invective, and anger are for the most part of Saxon origin. Words indicating a more advanced civilization and complex feelings, and most of the terms employed in art, science, mental and moral philosophy, are of classical origin. The English language, which is now spoken by nearly one-hundred millions of the earth's inhabitants, is in its vocabulary one of the most heterogeneous that ever existed. There is perhaps, no language so full of words, evidently derived from the most distant sources, as English. Every country of the globe seems to have brought some of its verbal manufactures to the intellectual market of England; Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Celtic, Saxon, Danish, French, Spanish, Italian, German—nay, even Hindustani, Malay, and Chinese words are mixed together in the English dictionary.

Tobogganing in Canada Wouldn't Suit Her.

Nellie—"Were you ever tobogganing in Canada?"

Minnie—"Yes; but it isn't half so nice as it is in Omaha."

"Too cold?"

"No, that doesn't matter, but the slide are awfully steep."

"Steeper than ours?"

"Oh, ever so much. Why, they are so dangerous that the gentlemen can't do a thing but just watch the course and steer."

"I wouldn't like that myself."

The Blindman's World.

The narrative to which this note is introductory was found among the papers of the late Professor S. Erastus Larrabee, and, as an acquaintance of the gentleman to whom they were bequeathed, I was requested to prepare it for publication. This turned out a very easy task, for the document proved of so extraordinary a character that, if published at all, it should obviously be without change. It appears that the professor did really, at one time in his life, have an attack of vertigo, or something of the sort, under circumstances similar to those described by him, and to that extent his narrative may be founded on fact. How soon it shifts from that foundation, or whether it does at all, the reader must conclude for himself. It appears certain that the professor never related to any one while living the stranger features of the experience here narrated, but this might have been merely from fear that his standing as a man of science would be thereby injured.

Edward Bellamy.

THE PROFESSOR'S NARRATIVE.

At the time of the experience of which I am about to write, I was professor of astronomy and higher mathematics at Abercrombie College. Most astronomers have a specialty, and mine was the study of the planet Mars, our nearest neighbor but one in the Sun's little family. When no important celestial phenomena in other quarters demanded attention, it was on the ruddy disc of Mars that my telescope was oftenest focused. I was never weary of tracing the outlines of its continents and seas, its capes and islands, its bays and straits, its lakes and mountains. With intense interest I watched from week to week of the Martial winter the advance of the polar ice-cap toward the equator, and its corresponding retreat in the summer; testifying across the gulf of space as plainly as written words to the existence on that orb of a climate like our own. A specialty is always in danger of becoming an infatuation, and my interest in Mars, at the time of which I write, had grown to be more than strictly scientific. The impression of the nearness of this planet, heightened by the wonderful distinctness of its geography as seen through a telescope, appeals strongly to the imagination of the astronomer. On fine evenings I used to spend hours, not so much critically observing as brooding over its radiant surface, till I could almost persuade myself that I saw the breakers dashing on the bold shore of Kelper land, and heard the muffled thunder of avalanches descending the snow-clad mountains of Mitchell. No earthly landscape had the charm to hold my gaze of that far-off planet, whose oceans, to the unpracticed eye, seem but darker, and its continents lighter spots and bands.

Astronomers have agreed in declaring that Mars is undoubtedly habitable by being like ourselves, but as may be supposed, I was not in a mood to be satisfied with considering it merely habitable. I allowed no sort of question that it was habited. What manner of beings these inhabitants might be I found a fascinating speculation. The variety of types appearing in mankind even on this small Earth makes it most presumptuous to assume that the citizens of different planets may not be characterized by diversities far profounder. Wherein such diversities, coupled with a general resemblance to man, might consist, whether in mere physical differences or in different mental laws, in the lack of certain of the great passional motors of men or the possession of quite others, were weird themes of never-failing attractions for my mind. The El Dorado visions with which the virgin mystery of the New World inspired the early Spanish explorers were tame and prosaic compared with the speculations which it was perfectly legitimate to indulge, when the problem was the conditions of life on another planet.

It was the time of the year when Mars is most favorably situated for observation, and, anxious not to lose an hour of the precious season, I had spent the greater part of several successive nights in the observatory. I believed that I had some original observations to the trend of the coast of Kepler Land between Lagrange Peninsula and Christie Bay, and it was to this spot that my observations were partially directed.

On the fourth night other work detained me from the observing-chair till after midnight. When I had adjusted the instrument and took my first look at Mars, I remember being unable to restrain a cry of admiration. The planet was fairly dazzling. It seemed nearer and larger than I had ever seen it before, and its peculiar ruddiness more striking. In thirty years of observation, I recall, in fact, no occasion when the absence of exhalations in our atmosphere has coincided with such cloudlessness in that of Mars as on that night. I could plainly make out the white masses of vapour at the opposite edges of the lighted disc, which are the mists of its dawn and evening. The snowy mass of Mount Hall over against Kepler Land stood out with wonderful clearness, and I could unmistakably detect the blue tint of the ocean of De La Rue, which washes its base,—a feat of vision often, indeed, accomplished by star-gazers, though I had never done it to my complete satisfaction before.

I was impressed with the idea that if I ever made an original discovery in regard to Mars, it would be on that evening, and I believed that I should do it. I trembled with mingled exultation and anxiety, and was obliged to pause to recover my self-control. Finally, I placed my eye to the eye-piece, and directed my gaze upon the portion of the planet in which I was specially interested. My attention soon became fixed and absorbed much beyond my wont, when observing, and that implied no ordinary degree of abstraction. To all mental intents and purposes I was on Mars. Every faculty, every susceptibility of sense and intellect, seemed gradually to pass into the eye, and become concentrated in the act of gazing. Every atom of nerve and will power combined in the strain to see a little, and yet a little, clearer, farther, deeper.

The next thing I knew I was on the bed that stood in a corner of the observing-room, half raised on an elbow, and gazing intently at the door. It was broad daylight. Half a dozen men, including several of the professors and a doctor from the village, were around me. Some were trying to make me lie down, others were asking me what I wanted, while the doctor was urging me to drink some whiskey. Mechanically spelling their offices, I pointed to the door and ejaculated, "President Byxbee—coming," giving expression to the one idea which my dazed mind at that moment contained. And sure enough, even as I spoke the door opened, and the [illegible] college, somewhat blown with climbing the steep stairway, stood on the threshold. With a sensation of prodigious relief, I fell back on my pillow.

It appeared that I had swooned while in the observing-chair, the night before, and had been found by the janitor in the morning, my head fallen forward on the telescope, as if still observing, but my body cold, rigid, pulseless, and apparently dead.

In a couple of days I was all right again, and should soon have forgotten the episode but for a very interesting conjecture which had suggested itself in connection with it. This was nothing less than that, while I lay in that swoon, I was in a conscious state outside and independent of the body, and in that state received impressions and exercised perceptive powers. For this extraordinary theory I had no other evidence than the fact of my knowlege in the moment of awaking that President Byxbee was coming up the stairs. But slight as this clue was, it seemed to me unmistakable in its significance. That knowledge was certainly on my mind on the instant of arousing from the swoon. It certainly could not have been there before I fell into the swoon. I must therefore have gained it in the meantime; that is to say, I must have been in a conscious percipient state while my body was insensible.

If such had been the case, I reasoned that it was altogether unlikely that the trivial impression as to President Byxbee had been the only one which I had received in that state. It was far more probable that it had remained over in my mind, on waking from the swoon, merely because it was the latest of a series of impressions received while outside the body. That these impressions were of a kind most strange and startling, seeing that they were those of a disembodied soul exercising faculties more spiritual than those of the body, I could not doubt. The desire to know what they had been grew upon me, till it became a longing which left me no repose. It seemed intolerable that I should have secrets from myself, that my soul should withold its experiences from my intellect. I would gladly have consented that the acquisitions of half my waking lifetime should be blotted out, if to exchange I might be shown the record of what I had seen and known during those hours of which my waking memory showed no trace. None the less for the conviction of its hopelessness, but rather all the more, as the perversity of our human nature will have it, the longing for this forbidden lore grew on me, till the hunger of Eve in the Garden was mine.

Constantly brooding over a desire that I felt to be vain, tantalized by the possession of a clue which only mocked me, my physical condition became at length affected. My health was disturbed and my rest at night was broken. A habit of walking in my sleep, from which I had not suffered since childhood, recurred, and caused me frequent inconvenience. Such had been, in general, my condition for some time, when I awoke one morning with the strangely weary sensation by which my body usually betrayed the secret of the imposition put upon it in sleep, of which otherwise I should have suspected nothing. In going into the study connected with my chamber, I found a number of freshly written sheets on the desk. Astonished that any one should have been in my rooms while I slept, I was astonished, on looking more closely, to observe that the handwriting was my own. How much more than astonished I was on reading the matter that had been set down, the reader may judge if he shall pursue. For these written sheets apparently contained the longed-for but despaired-of record of those hours when I was absent from the body. They were the lost chapter of my life; or rather not lost at all, for it had been no part of my waking life, but stolen from that sleep-memory on which mysterious tablets may well be inscribed tales as much more marvellous than this as this is stranger than most stories.

It will be remembered that my last recollection before awaking in my bed, on the morning after the swoon, was of contemplating the coast of Kepler Land with an unusual concentration of attention. As well as I can judge,—and that is no better than any one else,—it is with the moment that my bodily power succumbed and I became unconscious that the narrative which I found on my desk begins.

THE DOCUMENT FOUND ON MY DESK.

Even had I not come as straight and swift as the beam of light that made my path, a glance about would have told me to what part of the universe I had fared. No earthly landscape could have been more familiar. I stood on the high coast of Kepler Land where it trends southward. A brisk westerly wind was blowing and the waves of the ocean of De La Rue were thundering at my feet, while the broad blue waters of Christie Bay stretched away to the southwest. Against the northern horizon, rising out of the ocean like a summer thunder-head, for which at first I mistook it, towered the far-distant, snowy summit of Mount Hall.

Even had the configuration of land and sea been less familiar, I should none the less have known that I stood on the planet whose ruddy hue is at once the admiration and puzzle of astronomers. Its explanation I now recognized in the tint of the atmosphere, a coloring comparable to the haze of Indian summer, except that its hue was a faint rose instead of purple. Like the Indian summer haze, it was impalpable, and without impeding the view bathed all objects near and far in a glamour not to be described. As the gaze turned upward, however, the deep blue of space so far overcame the roseate tint that one might fancy he were still on Earth.

As I looked about me I saw many men, women, and children. They were in no respect dissimilar, so far as I can see, to the men, women, and children of the Earth, save for something almost childlike in the untroubled serenity of their faces, unfurrowed as they were by any trace of care, of fear, or of anxiety. This extraordinary youthfulness of aspect made it difficult, indeed, save by careful scrutiny, to distinguish the young from the middle-aged, maturity from advanced years. Time seemed to have no tooth on Mars.

I was gazing about me, admiring the crimson-lighted world, and these people who appeared to hold happiness by a tenure so much firmer than men's when I heard the words, "You are welcome," and, turning, saw that I had been accosted by a man with the stature and bearing of middle age, though his countenance, like the other faces which I had noted, wonderfully combined the strength of a man's with the serenity of a child's. I thanked him and said, "You do not seem surprised to see me, Edgerly," he answered. "I knew, of course, that I was to meet you to-day. And not only that, but I may say I am already in a sense acquainted with you, through a mutual friend, Professor Edgerly. He was here last month, and I met him at that time. We talked of you and your interest in our planet. I told him I expected you." "Edgerly?" I exclaimed. "It is strange that he has said nothing of this to me. I meet him every day. But I was reminded that it was in a dream that Edgerly, like myself, had visited Mars, and on awaking had recalled nothing of his experience, just as I should recall nothing of mine. When will men learn to interrogate the dream soul of the marvels it sees in its wanderings? Then he will no longer need to improve his telescops to find ont the secrets of the universe. "Do your people visit the Earth in the same manner?" I asked my companion. "Certainly," he replied; "but there we find no one able to recognize us and converse with us as I am conversing with you, although myself in the waking state. You, as yet, lack the knowledge we possess of the spiritual side of the human nature which we share with you." "That knowledge must have enabled you to learn much more of the Earth than we know of you," I said. "Indeed it has," he replied. "From visitors such as you, of whom we entertain a concourse constantly, we have acquired familiarity with your civilization, your history, your manners, and even your literature and languages. Have you not noticed that I am talking with you in English, which is certainly not a tongue indigenous to this planet?" "Among so many wonders I scarcely observed that," I answered. "For ages," pursued my companion, "we have been waiting for you to improve your telescopes so as to approximate the power of ours, after which communication between the planets would be easily established. The progress which you make is, however, so slow that we expect to wait ages yet." "Indeed, I fear you will have to," I replied. "Our opticians already talk of having reached the limits of their art." "Do not imagine that I spoke in any spirit of petulance," my companion resumed. "The slowness of your progress is not so remarkable to us as that you make any at all, burdened as you are by a disability so crushing that if we were in your place I fear we would sit down in utter despair." "To what disability do you refer?" I asked. "You seem to be men like us." "And so we are," was the reply, "save in one particular, but the difference is tremendous. Endowed otherwise like us, you are destitue of the faculty of foresight, without which we should think our other faculties well-nigh valueless.' "Foresight!" I repeated. "Certainly you cannot mean that it is given you to know the future?" "It is given not only to us," was the answer, "but so far as we know, to all other intelligent beings of the universe except yourselves. Our positive knowledge extends only to our system of moons and planets and some of the nearer foreign systems, and it is conceivable that the remoter parts of the universe may harbor other blind races like your own; but it certainly seems unlikely that so strange and lamentable a spectacleshould be duplicated. One such illustration of the extraordinary deprivations under which a rational existence may still be possible ought to suffice for the universe." "But no one can know the future except by inspiration of God," I said. "All our faculties are inspirations of God," was the reply, "but there is surely nothing in foresight to cause it to be so regarded more than any other. Think a moment of the physical analogy of the case. Your eyes are placed in the front of your heads. You would deem it an odd mistake if they were placed behind. That would appear to you an arrangement calculated to defeat their purpose. Does it not seem equally rational that the mental vision should range forward, as it does with us, illuminating the path one is to take, rather than backward, as with you, revealing only the course you have already trodden, and therefore have no more concern with? But it is no doubt a merciful provision of Providence that renders you unable to realize the grotesqueness of your predicament, as it appears to us."

"But the future is eternal!" I exclaimed. "How can a finite mind grasp it?" "Our foreknowledge implies only human faculties," was the reply. "It is limited to our individual careers on this planet. Each of us foresees the course of his own life, but not that of other lives, except so far as they are involved with his." "That such a power as you describe could be combined with merely human faculties is more than our philosophers have ever dared to dream," I said. "And yet who shall say, after all, that it is not in mercy that God has denied it to us? If it is a happiness, as it must be, to foresee one's happiness, it must be most depressing to foresee one's sorrow, failures, yea, and even one's death. For if you foresee your lives to the end, you must anticipate the hour and manner of your death,—is it not so?" "Most assuredly," was the reply. "Living would be a very precarious business, were we uninformed of its limit. Your ignorance of the time of your death impresses us as one of the saddest features of your condition." "And by us," I answered," it is held to be one of the most merciful." "Foreknowledge of your death would not, indeed, prevent your dying once," continued my companion, "but it would deliver you from the thousand deaths you suffer through the uncertainty whether you can safely count on the passing day. It is not the death you die, but these many deaths you do not die, which shadow your existence.

Sufferers are not generally aware that these diseases are contagious, or that they are due to the presence of living parasites in the lining membrane of the nose and eustachian tubes. Microscopic research, however, has proved this to be a fact, and the result is that a simple remedy has been formulated whereby catarrh, catarrhal deafness and hay fever are cured in from one to three simple applications made at home. The amount of reading matter has been somewhat condensed in the STANDARD for some weeks owing to extra adv ertising space being required but we trust our readers will take it all in good parts and console themselves with the thot' that what is their loss, in this respect, is our gain. Our reading space will now become greater, and thus our loss will be your gain ; by the way, if you had a glance over our exchanges you would find that the STANDARD gives more reading by a good deal than the average rural paper; this is however as we desire and hope to continue to the fore.

To The Electors
—OF—
SOUTH GREY.

GENTLEMEN.—In pursuance to the constitutional principle, that when there is any material extension of the Franchise, the House of Commons has been dissolved, and a new election will take place on Tuesday, 22nd February.

Having been chosen by the Liberal Conservative party as their Candidate, I beg to solicit your suffrage in the approaching contest.

If elected I shall give a fair support on all vital questions to the present Government, believing that it has shewn by its past record to be heartily in accord with the progressive spirit of the age, and that under its care the laws have been fairly and impartially administered, but on some questions I may be compelled to differ with it.

I shall favor the repeal of the present Franchise Act, and the substitution for it of Manhood Suffrage.

I believe there should be some radical change made in the constitution and functions of the Senate. or if this be not practicable then I should favor its abolition entirely.

The present fiscal system which gives protection to our manufactures has shewn itself to be successful and should be continued.

The depression existing in our agricultural interests and the small returns received by farmers from their investments and labors should engage the earnest and careful attention of our Legislators. Believing that the high rate of interest at which farmers are compelled to borrow money, causes a constant and large flow of their hard earnings to the capitalists of the old country, I think the Government should assume the control of the currency of the country, and that the necessary legislation should be passed to favor the establishment of Farmer's Banks, and the supply of cheap money to the agricultural classes.

Now that all the great public works rendered necessary by Confederation have been completed, I think the time has come to exercise the most rigid, careful and economical control of our expenditure, and to endeavor to carry out the affairs of the country without further increasing the public dept. Hoping my views will meet with your approbation and that you will favor me with your support and earnest co-operation. I am, Gentlemen,

Your Obt. Servant,

DAVID JAMIESON.

HOUSEHOLD.

The Hands.

The best adornment for the hands at any time is the dainty elegance of well-kept finger nails, but this is an elegance not easily attained, especially where one is engaged in manual labor. It is possible, however, to preserve the beauty of the finger nails, also that of the hands by the observance of certain precautions, the avoidance of strong soaps and too hot water, and the application of proper remedies for dryness and tenderness of the skin. At this season, especially, the hands of many persons are peculiarly liable to chap and become troublesome. To remedy this condition and to strengthen, nothing is so excellent as pure glycerine diluted with two or three times its weight of water, to be rubbed into the skin before retiring. A pair of loose, soft, old kid gloves should then be drawn on and worn during the night. Before rubbing on the glycerine the hands would be washed and the nails cleansed. Where the chapped surface has been neglected and become sore, the parts should be kept constantly wetted with the diluted glycerine, or spread for a day or so with spermaceti ointment before beginning treatment with glycerine. And here a word may be said about glycerine; complaint is frequently heard that glycerine disagrees with the skin; this sometimes happens from applying it without dilution with water to a badly chapped surface. By diluting pure glycerine with five or six times its bulk of water we gain a lotion which imparts delicacy, suppleness and an agreeable sensation to the skin. More than this, its regular use permanently softens and strengthens and preserves the skin from the effects of heat, cold, and drying winds.

Toilet Notes.

The dressing comb should have its teeth equally divided into two sets, the one large and open, the other finer and smaller, but not very fine, or sharp pointed. The teeth should be perfectly smooth and free from defects, and so shaped at their points and edges that they will pass easily through the hair, and without scratching the scalp. A good rubber comb is excellent for daily use.

A necessary article for the toilet stand is a good mouth wash; such is the myrrh and borax wash made by rubbing well together in a mortar one ounce each of honey and borax, then add gradually one quart spirit of wine (not above proof) and one ounce each of myrrh and red saunders wood. Macerate for fourteen days and filter. This will keep the month and gums in excellent condition.

Great care requires to be exercised in the selection of the hair brush, even more than the comb. Very rough, scratching, coarse brushes carelessly used are a fertile source of injury to the head and hair. No hair and no scalp can long stand, without injury, the irritation caused by them. A good hair brush should be formed of moderately long and fine, and rather stiff, unbleached and undyed bristles.

Hair brushes should be frequently cleansed. Loose hair may be removed by the coarse part of the comb, and dust and other impurities by rubbing and beating the brush. This should be done every time they are used. Once weekly they should receive more thorough cleansing by being washed in warm soap and water to which a little ammonia is added, after which they should be rinsed and rubbed dry as possible with a soft towel. It may be well to give a final rinsing with a little weak alum water, from which they should be merely shaken, the back only of the brush and the handle to be wiped dry.

Cosmetic gloves are worn by some ladies for the purpose of keeping the hands white and soft. To prepare them, turn a pair of white kid gloves inside out; they should be several sizes larger than those worn for the street. Brush over the inside a composition made in the following preparations: spermaceti ointment, quarter of a pound; melt and stair in one and a half drachms balsam of peru. In a few minutes pour off the clear portion and add a few drops of attar of rose and a little pure glycerine, then before it cools pour it into a china pot or box for future use. This ointment is excellent also for the lips in cold weather.

Tested Receipts.

Salad of Salmon.—Cut some cold salmon into slices or pieces about the size of a dollar, garnish with capers and strings of lettuce hearts; pour a salad dressing over the whole.

Celery Soup.—Wash and cut into small pieces, celery in sufficient quantity; blanch it, and then boil it with water, salt and nutmeg; pass it through a seive, and thin it with meat or chicken broth; cream can be added.

Domestic Cake.—One cup of butter, two cups of sugar, one cup of water and an even teaspoonful of soda. Make a stiff paste and knead until it does not stick to the hands or rolling board. Roll very thin and cut in any fancy shape with cake cutters and bake a light brown in a quick oven. An egg may be added if desired, and rolled out jumble shape in dry sugar.

Kidneys Saute.—Cut three kidneys each into five pieces; put an ounce of butter into the saute pan (frying pan), when very hot put in the kidneys, stir round for a few minutes with a spoon till they are set. Add a teaspoonful of flour, a quarter of one of salt and the third part of that of pepper. Mix well; add half a gill of broth and a few minutes is enough to do them.

Merserburg Biscuits.—Take four ounces of white sugar, seven ounces of flour, one tablespoonful of fresh cream and one egg. Make the above into dough, working it well. Then roll it out very thin, cutting it into pieces two inches long and one broad. Sprinkle the tops of the buscuits with sugar and ground cinnamon. Bake in a quick oven, and when done they should be a light yellow—brown. If put away in a cannister or jar they will keep a long time soft.

Butternut Cake.—Prepare one teacup of butternut meats, then take one cup of good molasses and half a cup of lard or any other shortening desired; pour over the two ingredients one cup of boiling water, then put in the nut meats and add one teaspoonful of soda, a pint of sifted flour and a teaspoonful of salt; beat well and bake in a moderate oven in one loaf cake dish. If liked the nuts may be omitted and a tablespoon of ginger substituted. Bake from half to three quarters of an hour. Try with a broom splint.

Chicken Pot Pie.—Cut up and parboil a pair of large fowls, seasoning them with pepper and salt. You may add some thin slices of good bacon. For the paste allow one half pound of best butter to every pound of a half of flour. There should be enough for a great deal of paste. Line the sides of the pot, two-thirds up, with paste. Put in the chickens with the liquor in which they were parboiled. Intersperse the pieces of chicken with layers of paste in thin square slices. Then cover the whole with a lid of paste, not fitting very closely. Make a cross slit in the top and boil the pie about an hour or more.

Saxony Cheese Cakes.—Warm in a stewpan a pint of good milk, and gradually stir into it, on the fire, three tablespoonfuls of flour; when the paste is free from lumps, add a little salt, a piece of butter, the size of a walnut, a quarter of a pound of gruyese, parmesan (or any other good cheese), or you may mix your cheese; it must be cut into small slices and not grated; take care that the whole be well incorporated, so as to be easily turned out of the stewpan; then mix it with three well-beaten eggs and keep the the paste warm till wanted for serving. Then butter a tin baking dish, put the paste into it, and set it in the oven. In ten minutes the cake should rise like a souffle and be of a fine yellow color. It should be well set in every part.

Doughnuts.—One cup of light bread sponge, half a cup of shortening, half a cup of milk, one cup of brown sugar; knead to stiff dough like bread and set to rise. When thoroughly light mold out on the bread board and roll out with the rolling pin till three-quarters of an inch thick. Cut the dough up with a knife in two-inch strips, check off the opposite way in diamonds and allow to rise in a warm place until light again. Then put into a deep kettle two or three pounds beef or pork drippings that are entirely sweet, or lard if preferred, and put it over the fire. Heat it so hot that the cakes when dropped in will immediately commence to boil and rise to the top. If too hot, remove from the fire twice every five minutes until done.

Apple Pot Pie.—Pare and core any kind of quick cooking tart apples. It will require about a quart of prepared apples for a family of three or four persons; make a light crust, using for that quantity one cup of sour cream a teaspoonful of salt and one of soda and two tablespoonfuls of shortening with good beef or pork drips. If the milk is sweet then flank the soda with two teaspoonfuls of cream tartar; make a stiff paste like biscuit and roll out; take a small smooth iron pot, one that will not blacken apples when stewed therein, and grease well on the bottom with butter, then put in the cored apples; cut strips of the crust and place around the sides; add in a teacup of cold water, roll out the top cover, make a deep gash in the centre and cross it in the opposite; have it round and fit it on neatly, wetting the edges of the crust; then place it over the fire until it boils up briskly. If you have a good fire the oven will be ready when it begins to boil over the top crust. Here it will cook slowly and be ready in about half an hour for the table. I use a little pot that holds from four to six quarts. If right and cooked good it will drop out whole with light, creamy crust.

Muffing It.

Customer.—"Don't show me any more Astrakhan. Pray what is that fur?"

Clerk.—"'Fur?' Why, fur to keep yer hands warm!"

Point in Philosophy.

Miss Minks—"Is it possible you really lost your way that cold night?"

Mr. Finks—"Yes, and I would have frozen to death if I had not kept in motion."

"In motion?"

"Yes. I did nothing but run all night."

"Oh, of course; how foolish I am! If we keep the water running it don't freeze."

Early Training.

"One of my school-mates," said an old man, "was a rich man's son. I was a poor boy. He had more pocket-money in a week than I ever handled in my life. He is now a conductor of a street car."

"And you?"

"I'm the driver of the car."

Editing a Paper.

Country Editor (to subscriber). "Yes, it requires [illegible] to edit a newspaper and make a success of it.

Subscriber. "I suppose it does. How is the Bugle doing now?"

Country Editor (with a sigh). "Not very well."

Taxing Physic Brow.

"Mr. De Golland, I pray tell me why you looked so fierce when you bowed to me this afternoon."

"I look fierce! Why, bless you, Miss Jones, I can't wrinkle my brow!"

Honest William.

Honest William was an easy and good-natured fellow,
Tho' he a little too often got a little mellow;
A bonnie coachman was he to an eminent brewer,
A better never sat on a box, to be sure.

For his coach was kept clean, and no mother or nurses
Took more care of their babes than he took of his horses;
He had these, aye, and fifty good qualities more,
But the business of tipling could ne'er be got o'er.

So his master effectually mended the matter,
By hiring a man who drank nothing but water.
"Drink water!" said William, "had all men done so,
You would never have wanted a coachman, I know.

"For 'tis soakers like me whom you load with reproaches Enables you brewers to ride in your coaches."

A New Sect of Philosophers.

"Well, Jane, this is a queer world," said Joe to his wife, "a sect of women philosophers has just sprung up."

"Indeed," said Jane, "and what do they hold?"

"The strangest thing in nature," said he, "their tongues!"

Two of a Kind.

A lonely Skating Rink met a Toboggan Slide the other day. "How are you feeling?" asked the Rink in doleful tones. "I am Hunky," replied the Slide. "I am fast Making Barrels of Money." "Come and see me in about Two Years from now," said the Rink, "and we will Condole together. I have Been There myself."

Very Neatly and Delicately Done.

"Ah, madam," he said as he extended a hand to help her up. "I never saw a more graceful fall. You threw up your arms like a born actress, your little feet indulged in a shuffle, and down you settled with a swan-like movement which was superb."

"Really, sir!"

"Honest Injun, madam."

And he picked up a No. 7 rubber which had been flung from her left foot, turned her back to a dent in the snow which looked as if a cottage had been upset there, and, raising his hat and making a profound bow he took his leave, while she got aboard a street car and continued to blush and smile or sixteen blocks.

Two Acute Observers.

Old Gentleman (walking very carefully): "Hallo, bub! This fine snow covers up the ice so that you can't see it, doesn't it?"

Small boy (holding on to the fence): "You're right, old man; but you feel it just as much when you slip down."

Different Points of View.

Willie—"Mamma, you ain't going to give all that chicken to Tommy, are you?"

Mamma—"No, Willie, dear; it is for you."

Willie—"Oh, what a little bite!"

Virtues of the Soul.

Trained heads, polished manners, and accumulated wealth may all be good things, but they are not the qualities that can make a trustworthy and honourable man nor a solid and safe community. The cultivation of the mind and senses may lead a man to be shrewd, keen, elegant, courteous, but it never has led, and it never will lead, a man or a class to be unselfish, self-sacrificing, self-denying, humble, and virtuous. The virtues of the intellect are not the virtues of the soul, and the latter are not to be found in grammar or arithmetic.

A 10 cent sample bottle of Nerviline is sufficient to cure colds, diarrhœa, spasms, dysentery, &c. Nerviline is just the thing to cure all pains, whether internal or external. PARIS SLAVES.

The Miserable Italian Children of the Gay Capital.

An Italian workman in Paris finds no meat and no wine; he can vegetate on water and macaroni, and sleep on a plank bed in a sickly loft, while his French brother must have his mattress in his room, his pint of claret and his stewed beef, and a respectable blouse to put on when Sunday morning comes around. One franc a day will satisfy the wants of one, while it takes four francs to do justice to the emergencies of the other; and thus it is why Italian workmen like to be found ready and willing to toil during ten, or even twelve hours for twenty or twenty-five cents. Many of these Italian exiles, however, encountered in Paris, Brussels, Lausanne and Geneva rarely stoop to manual labor in order to eke out a living. Before leaving their native land they kidnap boys and girls who have good voices, or bring their own children with them, and train them up to play tambourines and concertinas, or master the flute or the violin, and once they have received this elementary instruction the impressario travels all over Europe with them, and sometimes crosses over to America, where he generally fancies that a large fortune is to be made out of the material which he has got ready on hand. Cafes are generally the haunts of these itinerant minstrels. When he brings them into any town or city he takes up his quarters in one of the back lanes and sends them out to sing. If they do not lay a certain amount of money at his feet at night, when they come home, he beats them and sends them to bed supperless, and the result is that when they grow to the years of maturity they abandon the old tyrant. The cruelties practiced on these little ones are fearful to contemplate. A pretty, dark-eyed Neapolitan signorine looks pale and haggard at the early age of twelve or thirteen Summers, her features robbed of that rich red color of southern climes, and a pitiful, harrowing gaze in her orbs as she glances meekly at you and pleads mutely for a copper. Others carry scars and bruises on their cheeks—sad reminders of the ferocity of their owners, who pocket the swag and loll lazily at home all day, while their miserable little backs are wasting their lives away in the fetid atmosphere and low drinking saloons, crying for alms and forced to listen to the ribald conversation of besotted drunkards.

Sunday Playthings.

An eminent Christian minister, now gone to his rest, had Sunday playthings for his children. After their several religious duties and instructions were over the Sunday playthings were brought out, and they were the prettiest of all—beautiful books and pictures, with stories accompanying them, which they were not permitted to see except in this hour of recreation after Sunday duties were done. The father and mother gave themselves up religiously to making their children happy; so happy were they that Sunday was looked forward to as a day of delight. It was the day of sharply defined duties, but it was the only day that they could know certainly that there would be sweetmeats when duties were well done. But already we hear an ominous clearing of somebody's throat, as if heresy was being diffused. Some high-toned saint says: "nonsense; the next thing you hear will be sugar-plums for saying the catechism." Just so. We would give them a pound every Sunday if they would study it well. It is worth it. It will take as good hold on their moral and religious life and guide them as well in their future path as if it had been rolled in jalap and had sickened them all the way down. It is just as good a doctrinal method as whipping it up the spinal column, and a deal better than disgusting them by first doses, so that they will never learn it at all. We have no sympathy with parents who say they can not bring their children under religious culture by some of the multitudinous motives by which the human mind, soul, and body can be reached. No worse men or women have gone to perdition than have been saved by God's grace. The methods of family religion may have thwarted many a good purpose and loving heart behind it, but for all that the fact remains that the hardest hearts are conquered by the remembrance of home sanctities.

Each man has but a limited right to the good things of this world; and the natural allowed way by which he is to compass the possession of these things is by his own industrious acquisition of them.

Grandma—"Clara, do you think your mother would approve of your sitting up so late?" Clara—"Why, grandma, it was only 10:30 o'clock when Frank left last evening." Grandma—"Clara, your grandma happened to be awake just as Frank was leaving, and didn't she hear him say 'Now, Clara, just one'?"

FOREIGN NEWS.

There are 3,125 Smiths in London.

Only one girder of the Tay Bridge remains to be floated out and fitted up.

Over a hundred bagpipe players, Highland dancers and violin players recently held a competition at Glasgow.

Great landslips have taken place recently on the Moray Frith Railway near Cullen. One hundred men have been engaged night and day piling up.

Wm. Fisher, engine cleaner, was recently run over and killed by a train at Greenock. His father was killed in the same way seven years ago.

A fish preserving company intend to erect a factory at Barra, Inverneasshire, for the preservation of fish offal. The new industry will give employment to 100 men during the fishing season.

The Rev. Mr. Grant, F. C., Bradford, has raised a storm in Skye through opening a grocery in the manse and supplying poor people with goods below cost price. The merchants are holding indignation meetings.

Some Welsh lead mines belonging to a sequestered estate were sold in Edinburgh the other week for $3,250. It was stated in the salesroom that the bankrupt had expended $500,000 in purchasing and developing these mines.

This is the quick way they recruit their army in Mexico:—"A colonel, being short of men, sent fifty troopers into a Sonora town, and they ran down thirty or forty citizens, locked them up on a bogus charge of drunkenness, and had them sentenced to serve in the army for one year. All this took less than half a day."

The expenses of railroading in the hot climate of Mexico are great. Wooden ties have but a short life, cracking in the dry season and rotting during the rainy months. Bridge timbers and piles also wear out rapidly. Freight cars must be painted frequently to prevent drying and cracking, and even the substantial Pullman cars shrivel under this exposure. Fuel constitutes a large item of outlay.

The severe weather in Southern Europe is likely to postpone operations till a later date than ordinary, even if the worst comes to the worst. There has been a tremendous snowfall in Hungary and Poland. The Danube and Rhine are both frozen, and navigation is suspended. Snow has fallen at Genoa and Milan, and does great damage to the telegraph and railway service. Wolves have appeared near Rome, and a bounty is paid at the Capitol for heads, the first time in many years.

The North German Gazette reproduces the letters of King George of Hanover, written in 1867 and 1868, which were alluded to by Bismarck as proving that the king intrigued with the French to foil German unity and establish a Guelph empire. King George writes urging Napoleon to delay his attack upon Prussia until his preparations are completed, so that when the struggle occurs success will be assured. In another letter the king assures the emperor that France in assailing Prussia will have the sympathy of all the German people save in the old Prussian provinces.

There is a great deal of gossip among the French troops lately returned from Tonquin. It is currently acknowledged that French soldiers buried alive ten Chinamen, after making them dig their own graves. A boat-load of supplies was usually taken from natives under threats of death, after the allowance already given had been squandered. When a soldier was tried and condemned for treason his companions refused to shoot him, and when compelled to fire they fired either in the air or at one side, and the commanding officer was then compelled to use his own revolver. In the retreat of Lang-Son the entire culpability is averred to belong to Gen. Briere de l'Isle. It is generally said that Gen. Herbinger was a hero wantonly selected by his superior as a scapegoat for his own personal errors and weakness. Gen. Negrier, who commanded the left wing, was kept waiting without much-needed support while thousands of men were unoccupied at the cape. The soldiers stated that Admiral Courbet sought only glory for himself, and purposely sent out the first expedition with only two ships, though knowing that the island was nearly as large as France, so as to come up himself afterwards with twenty ships and give a winning and decisive blow. These stories create a gloomy and unpleasant impression.

An English gentleman has secured the services of thirteen clever boys drawn from all ranks of society. CHAPTER XXIV.—CONTINUED.

We left Gerald and Grace in conversation about their future hopes and prospects, just as Mrs. Wagner made her appearance before them apparently in one of her most imperious moods.

"Come," she said to Grace, "do not be idling there; I have some work for you to do."

"I am talking with my brother," said Grace, quietly.

"Then you will cease talking with your brother. Come this way at once!"

"No!" said Grace.

"No!" said Gerald.

"What! you defy me, do you—you two hateful imps? You think you are getting, both of you, old enough to have your own way, I suppose, but you will find to the contrary of that. It is you, Grace, I wish to speak to; and it concerns your safety so much that if you refuse to listen to me I don't know what may become of you."

"I do not refuse to listen to you;" said Grace. "Say what you have to say, Mrs. Wagner."

"I wish to say it to you alone."

"That will do no good, as I should tell it at once to Gerald, be it what it may; so you may as well, Mrs. Wagner, say it here, that he may listen to it at once."

"Very well. You will not obey me and I shall be forced to find one whom you must listen to; but, for you consolation, I can tell you that your Gerald that you make so much fuss with has fired on a king's ship, and so, if anything happens wrong about the Rift, he will he worse off than any one else."

"That is false," said Gerald.

"I thought so, dear," said Grace.

"Oh, you two wretches!" screamed Mrs. Wagner. "I will be even with you both before I have done with you. I could tell you something that you would like to hear, but I won't—no, I won't. You might have made friends with me and then I would have told you, but I won't now. Do you hear me?"

"Very well," said Grace.

This indifference to her shouts and to her blandishments raised the ire of Mrs. Wagner to fever heat, and going up close to Grace she said:

"I know your father—ha! ha! How my ire starts now—ha! ha! ha! Well, I don't mind telling you this much. Dolan is not your father."

"Not her father," said Gerald. "Then she is not my—"

"Sister!" gasped Grace.

"Nor is Dolan your father, for the matter of that," added Mrs. Wagner.

"We may still, then, dear Grace, be brother and sister."

"We are, Gerald. We shall ever be—in affection—in dear affection, if not in fact."

"Ever and ever," said Gerald.

"Very good," says Mrs. Wagner; "and now when you want to know a little more, perhaps you will be civil to me, for I only can tell you and make my terms with you."

Mrs. Wagner turned away, and as she did so she muttered something to herself about Dolan being out of his senses and that it was high time she (Mrs. Wagner) looked after herself.

Grace and Gerald continued silent for some time and looked in each other's faces by the dim light that marked the recess where they were and then Gerald took Grace's hands and placed them upon his breast as he said:

"My Gracie, on board the Rift is this young French girl whom I saved from the sea. She is very affectionate, and—and—I think—"

The color went and came in the fa f Grace and she could only see Gerald through a mist of tears.

"You think, dear Gerald, that she loves you. I, too, love you, and so will that—that—"

She turned her face away and Gerald felt the little hands trembling on his breast.

"Yes, Gracie—yes!"

"That I hope you love her and will be so—so very happy all your life with her, and I will love her too, Gerald, for your sake—I, too, will love her."

The large tear-drops fell from the eyes of Grace and then she made an effort to smile and to dash them from her eyes.

Gerald drew her gently toward him.

"My Gracie—sister—you shall be loved with all a brother's proudest affection. If no sister, there is none other who will ever be to me what you are, my Gracie. I love you—you only—you now—you in the past, when we were both little children—you in time to come, forever and forever!"

Grace covered her face with both her hands and some hysterical sobs came from her. Then a light footstep sounded close to them and a voice said:

"Ware spies. Master Gerald. She's coming to listen."

"Ah, Joseph!"

"Hush, sir! Mother Wagner is in the offing."

"Oh, Joseph! you will help us! We will trust you."

"You come to my lookout."

"The first plateau."

"Yes, soon."

"At once. Speak of something else, Gracie dear! The sea—the weather—anything.

"And did the ship fire on the Rift!" said Grace.

"Fie, dear! But the Rift outsailed it. The schooner could not keep up with us."

"Bah?" said Mrs. Wagner, as she crept away. "They are bad children yet. I could make something out of him, I fancy, but it wants caution. Dolan is mad about his ghost of a French girl in the cabin of the Rift."

Mrs. Wagner finding that there was nothing to learn by her espial upon Grace and Gerald, made no secret of her attempt to overhear them, but walked away without the least regard to secrecy in her footsteps.

The first plateau which the old seaman Joseph had mentioned as where he would be found was that lookout on the face of the cliff where it was, as a general thing, his duty to be, and where he had held several conferences with poor Grace, while Gerald was making that enforced voyage in the Rift.

They both now sought Joseph's post, and, as they went, they made up their minds thoroughly to trust him and to get him to concoct with them some means of saving Captain Mocquet and Marie from the cabin of the Rift.

The old sailor was anxiously expecting them, and when they appeared, he said:

"Come right away, as fast as you can, on to the plateau, my children; I want to speak to you both."

"And we to you, Joseph."

"Well, then, I'll hear you first."

"No, Joseph," said Grace, "you tell us what you want to say, and then we will make every confidence with you, for you have a good heart."

"Thank you, miss, for saying that, and God bless you. Well, then, what I want to say is, that I think Captain Dolan is going to desert the ship."

"Lord bless me! I mean the cavern; and I don't mean that he is merely going to desert it, but I think he is going to betray the whole lot of us to the preventives."

"Indeed, Joseph!"

"Yes, Master Gerald. I know him pretty well, you see, and have had more than one voyage with him when he was only a smuggler. I'm afeard, now, he's something worse."

"He is, indeed!"

"Just so, Master Gerald, and I think he knows the game is pretty well up here, and he will be off with all he can lay his hands on; and the crew will find, before they can say Jack Robinson, that they will all be taken."

"Yes, yes," said Gerald, "and that was why he wished so particularly to make me go this one voyage—it being his last—in order that I should be convicted with them."

"That's about it, Master Gerald."

"O Gerald! Gerald! said Grace, "what shall we do?"

"Levant!" said Joseph.

"What, Joseph—what is that?"

"Be off, miss—you, and me, and Gerald, and one more."

"Who is that?"

"Martin, and here he is."

"Well, Bo," said Martin, as at this moment he came on to the plateau, "how is the weather?"

"West by north, mate, and puffy. Here's the two children. I've been a talking to 'em about him."

"Dolan?"

"Aye, aye! mate, and I've been a saying that you and me, and them, too, had better up anchor and sheer off, with all the canvas we can set to the wind."

"I think so, too," said Martin.

"Then hear me," said Gerald. "I cannot go without others. There are two people in the cabin of the Rift that I have promised to stay by, and sink or swim with."

Martin nodded.

"I thought as much. The Frenchman's little girl is there, is she not?"

"She is."

"I thought it by the poor old man's work, but how she got there I can't think. Dolan has told Bowline that he has seen a ghost in the cabin, and that he wouldn't go into it for a thousand pounds. He wants Bowline to go and clear out his lockers for him."

"I saved Marie Mocquet," said Gerald. "I saved her from the wreck of the Coquette, and brought her into the cabin, by the help of her father, through the port."

Martin whistled.

"Hold hard," said Joseph. "There's wind enough."

"All right, Bo. Well, Master Gerald, we will do the best we can. A Frenchman, I take it, is, after all, a human being."

"No doubt of it," said Joseph.

"And he can't help being a Frenchman."

"Not a bit, mate."

"And this one, I will say, seems to me as if he had the feeling of a Christian. Now, Master Gerald, we will get him and his baby away somehow."

"It is not a baby," said Gerald.

"Oh, ain't it? Very good! I propose that we wait quietly till all's at rest in the sea cave, which won't be till after the cargo has been taken to the shore. That Mr. Suffles will be there to buy it, as usual; and then, when the boats come back, Dolan will go to rest and the Rift will be left to ride out the night with only one man on board, as a night watch."

"But how shall we get off?" said Gerald. "Can we get to the ravine easily from the sea cave? I only know of a way through the large cavern."

"Oh! you leave that to us," said Martin. "I dare say, Master Gerald, that Joseph and I know a little more of the old cliff than you do."

"And now, mate," said Joseph, "when we get away where are we to go to?"

"Look here," said Martin, "I think that you and I, my Bo, have had enough of this kind of life. Let us make our way right away eastward till we come to some nice little place, and then we will buy a boat, and set up respectable, and get a living for these two young ones by fishing, and what else turns up. I have more than enough money to set us afloat."

"That's it!" said Joseph.

"And do you think," said Gerald, with emotion—"God bless and reward you both!—do you think that I would let myself be a burden to you, and my dear Grace, either? Oh, no—no! I will find something to do that will help us all."

"All right, Master Gerald," said Martin. "You make your mind easy about the Frenchman and his baby."

"I tell you again," said Gerald, "it is not a baby, but a young lady."

"Why, you stupid fellow," said Joseph, "what's making babies run in your head—eh? He said as she wasn't a baby."

"It was Dolan said she was a child, and so I thought of a baby; but I won't do so again. You keep all snug, Master Gerald, and you, too, Miss Grace, till the boats come back, and then I will need you and Joseph here, and we will set to work."

"We shall be very grateful to you," said Grace.

"Don't you think of that, my dear. You can take care of the Frenchman's bab—Lord bless me, mate, when once you get a baby into your mind how difficult it is to get it out."

Grace laughed and Gerald looked annoyed as he said:

"I tell you again and again that she is a beautiful little girl and [illegible] —I must [illegible]"

"Go it!" said Joseph.

"Come, dear," said Grace, as she slid her arm within that of Gerald. "Come, you want rest, Gerald."

It was deep in the night when that same little party were assembled on the chalky plateau of the old cliff.

CHAPTER XXV.—CAPTAIN MORTON ON THE TRACK OF HIS DAUGHTER.

When Captain Morton went from Admiral Clifford so abruptly for the purpose of seeking the woman Wagner, from whom he now fully expected he should be able, by fair means or by foul, to procure the information he required, in order to enable him at once to clasp to his heart his long-lost child, he was in that state of mental excitement that submerges everything in the one dominant idea.

That the cottages he sought by the sea beach were some distance off on the coast, and lying in a hollow of the beach he had been sufficiently informed, and it at once appeared to him that the best and the easiest way to reach them was by cruising round to them in his own yacht.

On board that yacht he had likewise several men, on whom he knew he could depend in any emergency to perform for him any service that required courage and address, and how could he tell but that those qualities might be largely called into action yet in the proceedings necessary to enable him to gain possession of his daughter? If he could find that she was at one of the cottages, with what joy would he clasp her at once to his arms, and despite any and all possible opposition that might be offered to him carry her on board the Nautilus.

In the noble little vessel that had brought him in safely over the swelling billows of the wide Atlantic he felt that he had a friend and an ally, and in the few brave hearts who had adventured that voyage with him he knew he had those to whom he had only to say that heart and hand were wanted in the right and they were all his own.

Thus was it, then, that Captain Morton felt much more hopeful of the recovery of his daughter, by going to the cottages by the beach in his yacht, the Nautilus, than as if he had sought them by land and with the whole posse comitatus of Falmouth at his heels.

Skimming gallantly over the waves, the Nautilus soon passed the group of cottages, in one of which the old dying—now dead—smuggler, Hutchin, had made to Captain Morton such important revelations. After that spot was passed there were several bluffs and little headlanks, and there, in a wildly picturesque spot, where the full force of the land slip so long ago had been felt, he saw the group of fishermen's huts he was in search of.

A brief order brought up the Nautilus on another tack, and she beat up for the little half bay, half indentation—rugged and unequal in its dimensions as it was—on the margin of which were the cottages.

Then a touch of the helm and the Nautilus rode so lightly off and on the wind that she scarcely shifted her position twenty yards in the water, although she carried one sail and there was nothing to hold her to the bottom of the deep.

A boat was lowered from her side and with one of his men only Captain Morton pulled for the shore.

That shore presented rather a curious aspect.

The beach was low and level, just before the eight or ten cottages, and looked from the sea like very fine sand, but it was in reality rather rough shingle, mingled with the debris of the chalk cliffs.

Lying on the beach were various fishing nets drying; for although the men who composed the lawless crew of Dolan never gave themselves to so calm and tranquil a pursuit as fishing, yet some of them had families and the children had taken to the nets, and had made a kind of pleasurable business of that which in the first place their fathers had effected to do, as a mere blind for their more nefarious and guilty pursuits.

From several of the chimneys of the huts there curled thin wreaths of smoke, and a couple of boats on the beach, both in good order with the oars carefully secured in them and the thole pins hanging by cord, testified that care was taken to have, at all events, the means of readily going to sea from that stop.

The boat of Captain Morton grounded on the shingle and he sprang to shore.

A ragged looking urchin, with his trousers curled up to his knees, came into the water to help pull up the boat, but it was not Captain Morton's instructions that it should be beached.

"No," he said, "that will do."

The boy looked at him, then inquiringly and said, as he touched his cap:

"The spring, sir."

"What spring?"

"Thereaway, sir. They say it's all rain that's in the water, but I never seed rain that away like, sir, afore."

A chalybeate spring gushed out of a huge fragment of the fallen rock and Captain Morton shook his head as he said:

"No, I do not come for the spring—which is the cottage of Mrs. Wagner?"

"That one, sir."

The boy indicated one of the cottages, from the chimney of which came rather more smoke than from any of the others, and then he added:

"But I don't think she's at home, sir; though, mayhap, old Madge be."

"Who is old Madge?"

"She minds the cottage while Mrs. Wagner goes a fishing with Mr. Dolan. I'll go and see if she be there, though, for a penny, sir."

"I can do that myself. Perhaps this Mr. Dolan may be there."

Captain Morton had been walking up the shingle as he spoke to the boy at the rather slow pace which such such a place necessitates, and as he got a few paces in front of the lad he suddenly heard a very shrill whistle behind him and found that it proceeded from the boy, who produced it by a reed he had at his lip.

"What do you whistle for?"

"Nothing, sir."

That it was for something, however, was fully evident; for the door of Dolan's cottage was on the moment opened, and a female looked out. Then the door was closed again, and there seemed to the attentive ears of Captain Morton the sound of fastening it within. The captain looked at the boy with a forced smile as he said:

"[illegible] you have only done your duty!"

Two-thirds of a teaspoonful of ginger in a pint of stock fed will excite the appetite of a sheep that is poisoned.

A writer in the Dairyman says: "The very poorest ensilage I have ever seen has been in the silos of agricultural colleges. Fact."

Even in the coldest weather the manure from horse stables should be drawn out on the land at least once a week. It heats rapidly and soon becomes "fire-fanged," which greatly injures it.

It is never best to churn all the cream on hand. That which was skimmed last has not had time to get into uniform condition with the rest, and most of its butter goes into the buttermilk. It also makes butter come slowly, and after a long time has been needlessly spent in churning.

It is important that land plaster be sown early enough in the season to have it thoroughly dissolved by rains. Any time in the winter is better than after dry weather has come in spring. It is a common practice in places where it is used largely to sow it on clover in the winter before other and hurrying work begins.

A farrow cow may be fattened by high feeding while still giving milk. But unless there is especial use for the milk it is not good policy to do so. Dairymen who can make evey quart of milk pay high prices do it, but farmers who rely on turning milk into buttermilk will do better to dry early and fatten all the faster. They thus get the profit of making oleomargarine without its attempted fraud.

It is slow, hard work to cut stalks by hand for a number of cattle, requiring one or two hours per day, which, if time is valuable, as it ought to be, should not be wasted in this way. For a few dollars a horse-power cutter can be got, which in a single day will cut all the stalks to be used daring the winter. The old-fashioned buckwheat bran is excellent feed for milch cows, as it is very stimulating to milk production. In many families where the old-fashioned buckwheat flour is used the finer portions of the middlings are sifted and mixed with it as a measure both of economy and healthfulness. If good old-fashioned buckwheat flour could be had there would be an active demand for it at half a cent a pound, or even more advance on prices charged for that adulterated with wheat flour. This extra price would about represent the profit that the manufacturers make by the adulteration of the genuine product.

Machinery is not labor-saving. The man who works with a threshing machine, works as hard as his father did with a flail, but he produces greater results. To those who think only of the price of wages, machinery is a fraud, but to the consumer of manufactured articles it is a boon. Our mothers used to card their own wool, spin and weave and wear it, and it is no disparagment to our wives and sweethearts that they do not. They can't afford to. If it were not too expensive, the present race of women and girls would do this and more too. Machinery has not obviated the necessity of work, it has only given it a new direction. Good machinery is a good thing, but the man who expects it to do his work will be fooled; it helps him to do more work.—Ex.

Nervous Horses.

Finely bred, intelligent horses are very often nervous. They are quick to take notice, quick to take alarm, quick to do what seems to them, in a moment of terror, necessary to escape from possible harm, from something they do not understand. That is what makes them shy, bolt and run away. We cannot tell what awful suggestions strange things offer to their minds. For aught we can tell, a sheet of white paper in the road may seem to the nervous horse a yawning chasm, the open front of a baby carriage the jaws of a dragon ready to devour him, and a man on a bicycle some terrifying sort of flying devil without wings.

But we find the moment he becomes familiar with those things or any other that affright him, and knows what they are he grows indifferent to them. Therefore, when your horse shies at anything make him acquainted with it; let him smell it, touch it with his sensitive upper lip, and look closely at it. Remember, too, that you must familiarize both sides of him with the dreaded object. If he only examins it with the near nostril and eye, he will be very apt to scare at it when it appears on his off side.

So, then, rattle your paper, beat your brass drum, flutter your umbrella, run your baby carriage, and your bicycle, fire your pistol, and clatter your tinware on both sides of him and all around him until he comes to regard the noise simply as a nuisance and the material objects as only trivial things liable to get hurt if they are in his way. He may not learn all that in one lesson, but continue the lesson and you will cure all his nervousness.

LIBERTY.

BY JOHN IMRIE, TORONTO.

Sweet Liberty!—thou birthright of mankind,
Yet which some autocrats would fain destroy!
How like our God to give!—like man to take
What God hath given so freely in his love
To make our life on earth seem bearable!
Though man loves liberty, yet—miser-like—
Seeks to withhold it from his fellow-man,
Aye, boasting pride himself in larceny!
Go to! thou false vile traitor to thy race,
Thy stony heart is inder'd on thy face!
While loving liberty thyself—deny
To those within thy power their liberty!
The soul that seeks to bind his fellow-man
Shall soon be measured by an infant's span!

HOUSEHOLD.

Unexpected Company.

A volume could be written on this subject and many a housekeeper who has found herself in a tight place with an unannounced guest or guests would welcome its advent with great joy. Have we not each and every one of us, with company in the parlor and misgivings in our hearts, started for the pantry to find that, like Mother Hubbard, when we "got there, the cupboard was bare," and dinner, and a good one too, a necessary of the near future.

The Canadian hen has done considerable for her country, and has never received a tithe of the homage to which she is entitled. The guest who cannot make a satisfactory dinner on scrambled eggs, or omelet and baked potatoes, is not the friend to be received with open arms. And if the larder shows a half slice of ham, or some shavings of smoked beef left from a previous meal, the omelet is a little richer, and able to satisfy a good appetite the more.

The remains of a fowl may, at the time when the hungry guest sits in state in the best room, fill the eye of the beholder with regret. Not with sorrow for its loss, but that it is not as it was yesterday, crisp and whole.

Take courage—and a good knife—and strip the bones of all the remaining meat, and with the dressing, put it in the frying pan or "spider," with a little water and butter, and some gravy, if any was left from yesterday's dinner. Toast some slices of bread nicely, turn hot water over them, and turn off all that is not immediately absorbed, put the slices on a platter, covering them with the prepared fowl or chicken. A little meat will go a great way prepared in this manner, and the good dinner be an assured fact.

Or the quantity of meat may not be sufficient even for this dish, but may perhaps make enough croquettes to help out the dinner already planned for the family.

Chop or crumb stale bread very fine. Also chop an onion, adding the chicken picked from the bones, and season with salt, pepper, and celery salt. Beat up an egg, add it to the chicken and bread crumbs, and mold with the hands into flat cakes, or rolls. Put some butter in the frying pan, and when brown put the croquettes in, letting them cook until the surface is browned and crisp. It is not a necessity to cook them in boiling fat, as so many receipts affirm, as the small quantities of butter renders them quite as good and much more digestible.

Both of these dishes may be prepared in a very short time, and have the merit of being a little different from what comes to the table every day.

The cans of salmon and lobster which so many housekeepers keep in the house constantly, are convenient, and many suppose them only suitable for suppers, as they seem rather cold for a dinner dish. Know then, that in croquettes they are called excellent, made in the same manner as the chicken above described.

An appetizing dish is made by opening a can of salmon and draining off the oil. Take a baking dish, put in it a layer of bread crumbs, then a layer of salmon, until the salmon is all used, the bread crumbs making the top layer. Heat a large cupful of milk thicken it with a dessertspoonful of corn starch or flour, season with butter, salt, and very little, if any, pepper. Turn this same over the salmon and put in the oven, letting it remain until browned on top. This will make a good meal for seven or eight persons, and is an excellent substitute for meat.

We shall hope to give in succeeding issues more "emergency dishes," of which we think a housekeeper cannot possess too great a repertoire.

We shall be glad to receive additions to our own stock, which may be guaranteed to be good and in frequent use, as are those already given.

Original and Tested Recipes.

A Good Pudding Sauce.—One-half cupful sugar, one-quarter cupful butter, or less, one egg. Flavoring, lemon or vanilla; tablespoonful of flour; beat all together. Pour on boiling water just before serving the pudding, and stir thoroughly. Excellent, almost equal to a custard.

Orange Snow.—Scant half box of gelatine, let it stand twenty minutes in cold water enough to cover it; drain off, then add one pint boiling water, whites of two eggs, juice of two oranges, and one cupful of sugar, beat thoroughly until it becomes a solid foam, set on ice to harden.

Lobster Salad.—Chop, not too fine, the meat of one large or two small lobsters. Pour over this a generous quantity of the above salad dressing, and mix thoroughly. Serve in lettuce leaves piled in form of a pyramid. Garnish with olives, capers, and squares of cold beet. Be sure that it is very cold when sent to table.

Sauce.—One pint of boiling milk, thicken with one tablespoonful corn starch, yelks of the two eggs, one-half cupful sugar. To serve, pour custard in a glass dish, and drop the snow on it. Peel two oranges, and remove from them all the thick, white skin, divide into the smallest sections, and place at regular intervals in the snow.

Aunt Mary's Brown Bread.—One cupful Indian meal, one cupful graham flour, two-third cupful rye and fill up cup with white flour, one-half cupful molasses, one teaspoonful of saleratus dissolved in a little hot water, three cupfuls of milk, one teaspoonful salt, one teaspoonful butter. Steam from four to five hours. See that the water does not stop boiling, or boil entirely away.

Salad Dressing.—Beat the yelks of eight eggs, and add to them a cupful of sugar, a tablespoonful each of salt, mustard, and black pepper, also a little cayenne pepper, and half a cupful of cream. Mix thoroughly. Boil a cupful of butter in one pint and a half of vinegar. Pour this upon the mixture, and stir well. When cold put it in bottles. This dressing will keep for weeks.

Miscellaneous.

Sit down whenever you can find an opportunity. Many stand even when preparing vegetables for dinner, a work that is much easier performed sitting.

Do not attempt to dry calicos and ginghams out of doors at this season of the year. Freezing causes the colors to fade more quickly than anything else. Wash and hang up to dry immediately in garret or kitchen.

To renovate black silk, grate a large potato, add a pint of water and stir. Sponge the silk with this, using a piece of black cloth to apply it. Do not iron the silk, but roll it on old broom handles, or on round smooth sticks, very tightly, and lay aside until perfectly dry. It will have an appearance almost equal to new, and will not lose its stiffness much sooner than new silk.

MEN AND WOMEN.

Bob Ingersoll's hair is white as snow.

It is generally expected that Sir John Macdonald will be made an Earl this year.

The Princess of Wales plays the zither well, and now her husband has taken up the banjo.

Sarah Bernhardt is now playing on the west coast of South America, and in Lima eight performances gave her $30,000 receipts.

Rosa Bonheur is at present in Nice. She has bought two lions from Bidel, to serve as models for a painting which has been ordered by an American and for which a long price is expected.

There is one decided peculiarity about Gen. Boulanger, the French Minister of War. All his speeches—and the moderate journals upbraid him with indulging in too many—are devoted to the promotion of peace.

Before Merlatti completed his fifty days' fast, several sentimental ladies of Paris addressed a letter to Merlatti's father in Italy asking him to exercise his parental authority to dissuade his son from continuing his work of self-destruction. Signor Merlatti, Sr., replied as follows: "My son, that fool, is no longer a suckling, and I am no wet nurse who can force naughty children to eat. If the art of painting is so unprofitable that a man devoted to it must have recourse to such tricks in order to make a living, then per dio, I don't regret a single one of the whippings I gave my boy years ago on account of his dream of becoming an artist."

Canon Wilberforce evinced the broadness and charity of his views by preaching in the Albion Congregational Chapel, Southampton, at the monthly special service recently. There was no injunction from the Bishop, for the simple reason that the Bishop was not consulted. Canon Wilberforce felt it his duty thus far to break through the barriers of ecclesiastical exclusiveness, and he broke through them in the manner he thought the best. The Canon prayed that God's blessing might rest upon pastor and church, and upon the Church universal, and that Christian men might reach over the barriers which separated them. Afterwards he preached a powerful Evangelical sermon.

Nils Haugen, the Norwegian who has been nominated for Congress to succeed the late W. T. Price, of Wisconsin, will be one of the great men of the Fiftieth Congress, so far as size goes. He is six feet four inches, and weights 300 pounds. He owes his greatness mainly to America, as he is not much of a Norwegian. Like most of the prominent Scandinavians, he came to America when he was a baby, and was educated to be an American in speech and habits. Haugen is a graduate of the law school at Ann Arbor, Mich., class of '74. He is a fine stenographer, and made his living at court reporting for several years. He has been in the State Legislature several terms, and since 1882 has been State Railroad Commissioner. He has a big, round, moon face, and in very light in complexion.

One of the heroines of this world unknown to fame, and of whom the world hardly hears at all, is by name Mrs. Laura Thomas. Left a widow with seven little children and an uncultivated farm of eighty acres, with a $300 mortgage on it, in a bleak part of Wisconsin, as her legacy, she managed to exchange the land and log cabin for a home in St. Andrews, Fla. Without the means to convey her and her family thither by either steam or rail, this brave woman put her children in a wagon with the intention of driving all the way. She reached St. Louis last week—800 miles of her journey—and was there obliged to sell her ponies and wagon, but the $53 which they brought, and which, it is said, was twice as much as they were worth, would not take her far on her way to the new home. But here the touch of Nature that makes the whole world kin came to her aid. The half-naked and hungry children were clothed and fed, transportation was furnished, and with a stout heart, undismayed by past suffering or prospect of future struggles she journeyed on. And she was not of the tramp order, either, but an educated woman, and withal something of a writer and a poet.

The Romance of a Bank Note.

In the year 1740 one of the directors of the Bank of England, a man of unimpeachable honor, lost a bank note for thirty thousand pounds, under peculiar circumstances. It seems he had bought an estate for that sum of money, and for convenience sake obtained a note for that amount. As he was about to put it under lock and key, after he reached home, he was called out of the room, whereupon, as he thought, he placed it on the mantelpiece. Upon returning, a few minutes later, the note had disappeared. It could not have been stolen, for no one had entered the room, whereupon he concluded that it had been blown into the fire and had been consumed. He laid the matter before the officers of the bank, and they reissued a note for the same amount, he giving bonds to reimburse the bank if the note should ever be presented for payment. Thirty years after, when he had long been dead, and his estate distributed among his heirs, the supposed non-existent note turned up at the bank counter for payment. As the bank could not afford to dishonor the obligation, the money was paid out, and the heirs of the dead man were asked to make good the loss; this they refused to do, nor could the bank employ any legal machinery to force them to do so. The person who profited by the matter was supposed to be a builder, employed to pull down the dead man's house and build another in its site. He found the missing thirty thousand pound note in a crevice in the chimney, in which it somehow got lodged after being laid on the mantelpiece. It must have been kept many years, and its presentation to the bank was so arranged that the builder became a rich man by a sudden stroke of blind fortune.

Equal to the Emergency.

"That is an elegant suit you have on," observed a Toronto animated fashion plate to a companion dude. "Who is your tailor?"

"That question I must decline to answer, because I don't think that I need any help in ruining the poor fellow. That is one emergency to which I am fully equal.

HEALTH.

A Prevention of Consumption.

A contemporary tells of a physician's experience, in a certain hospital, with patients who coughed excessively. He was convinced that they were hacking much more than was necessary or safe. By promising rewards and punishments, he induced them to hold their breath when tempted to cough. He was surprised in a short time to see some of them enjoying a complete recovery from their disease. Constant hemming and coughing is just like scratching a sore, as long as this is continued the sore will not heal. When persons are tempted to cough let them draw a full breath, hold it until it warms and eases every air-cell and benefit will soon follow from this process. The nitrogen which is thus occasionally retained acts as an anodyne to the irritated mucous membrane thus satisfying the desire to cough and giving the throat and lungs a chance to heal. At the same time a suitable medicine will aid nature in her effort to recuperate. It is very important to cure lung troubles in their early stage. Every cold can almost be cured if attended to in its incipiency. If there is any fear that a throat or lung trouble has been contracted, no time should be lost in consulting a good physician. It is remarkable how a thorough examination, and a welcome conclusion that there is necessarily no fatal trouble, will even save from consumption some persons who have become chronic invalids through a morbid fear.

Rules for Living Well

The Caterer, in an article on "Good Living" considered from a culinary rather than a moral point of view, sums up the matter in the following sensible way:

If living well consists in living neither luxuriously nor expensively, in what, then lies the secret? And how many men of moderate means take advantage of it? The question is not a difficult one to answer. We will put the answer in the shape of a few short rules.

1. Buy with judgment.

2 Buy the best, for the best is always the cheapest.

3. Let your economy regulate the quantity, not the quality.

4. Let your cook be a cook, and one that knows how to utilize what is now thrown to the dogs, or otherwise wasted.

5. Study simplicity in the number of the dishes, and variety in the character of the meals.

6. Let the housewife be watchful enough to trace the leaks that are liable to spring in every larder.

7. Let the mistress be indeed the head of her own household and of her own kitchen.

Oysters as Food.

It is all nonsense about a steady diet on oysters being injurious to the system. Many persons think so, however. It may be true that oysters do not produce the most pleasant results when cooked in a rich style and eaten just before going to bed. When taken with wine late at night, of course, if there is any bad effect next day the oysters are blamed for it. Oysters have excellent medicinal qualities, are nutritious and when plainly cooked, or eaten raw are very wholesome, especially in cases of indigestion. Oysters never produce indigestion, and that is something that cannot be said of any other alimentary substance. During my experience I have found in several cases where oysters have been taken daily they have done much toward curing the patient. Invalids have discovered in oysters the required ailment, besides being far the most agreeable food to take. Raw oysters, too, are said to be very good for hoarseness, although I have never tested their merits on that point. It is my belief that the oyster is the most healthful article of food known to man.

How to Prevent Diphtheria.

The first and most essential agents for preventing contagion are, cleanliness, pure air, and sunlight. These are nature's great antiseptics. For the first great essential, cleanliness, our local Boards of Health seem to have but little regard. If they would spend one half the time in cleaning the back alleys that they consume in magnifying the few isolated cases of diphtheria, the original invasion of an epidemic might often be averted. "Prevention is better than cure," but after the epidemic has once begun, the question naturally arises; how shall we limit its ravages? The first means to be thought of is isolation. The patient ought, if possible, to be placed in an upper front room that is light and airy, and all but adult members of the family excluded. No children should be permitted to be exposed to the contagion. All unnecessary furniture should be removed, and, as far as possible proper germicides should be freely used.

The following rules for disinfection, as given in Gatchell's Key Notes, are very simple and perhaps as good as any:

FOR AIR OF SICK ROOM.

Potassium permanganate, 1 dr.; Oxalic acid, 1 dr.; mix and moisten with twice the quantity (by bulk) of water; in two hours add a small quantity more of water. It will emit ozone freely enough for a large room, and it is an active disinfectant.

For drinking water, add sufficient permanganate of potassium to render it slightly pinkish in strong light, then filter.

For water-closets, drains, and water-pipes;

Hot water.....	2½ gallons.
Copperas.....	4 pounds.
Carbolic acid.....	4 pounds.

Especially useful in typhoid fever, dysentery, etc., as well.

For drains, ditches, and sewers, disinfect with chloride of lime. One pound is sufficient for one thousand gallons of running sewerage.

For washing clothing:

Sulphate of zinc.....	2½ ounces.
Carbolic acid.....	1 ounce.
Hot water.....	1 gallon.

Soak the clothes twelve hours, then wash.

Heavy clothing, blankets, etc., to be disinfected, should be opened and exposed. Close the room as tightly as possible; stuff all cracks, and paste paper over the key holes. Place sulphur in iron pans; set on bricks in wash-tubs containing a little water. Ignite it by aid of hot coals, or a spoonful of alcohol poured over it and ignited with a match. Hasten from the room, and keep it closed for twenty-four hours; then open windows wide, and air it thoroughly. For a room ten feet square, use two pounds of sulphur, and for larger ones a proportionate quantity.

Health Notes.

Scraped potatoes applied to a burn are efficacious in relieving the pain and reducing inflammation. As fast as the scrapings grow warm, take them off and apply freshly scraped potato.

Take plenty of out-door exercise. God's sunlight and the fresh air of Heaven are two of the best preventives of sickness known to man—add to these the healthy state of the circulation induced by exercise and the enlivening effect on the mind, and disease won't have much of a foothold.

Mme. Blavataky, the famous leader of the theosophists, is as strict in her diet as the most rigid observer of the Mohammedan faith. She is, however, fond of sweet meats, fig paste and almonds. The one thing she dreads above all others is corpulence, and she takes every means to keep her weight from increasing.

Eating.—Great eaters never live long. A voracious appetite, so far from being the sign of good health, is a certain indication of disease. Some dyspeptics are always hungry, and feel best when eating; but as soon as they have finished eating they endure torments so distressing in their nature as to make the poor victim wish for death.

When one's clothing becomes damp from exposure to the weather, it is best to change it immediately. Rub the skin with a dry, hard towel until the body is in a glow all over. But if it is impracticable to change the garments, exercise moderately so that enough heat may generate in the system to dry the skin and clothing without a chill.

Winter.

BY NORA LAUGHER.

"Winter is here!" The sleigh-bells say
As they gally dash along,
"Begone dull care! Be bright, be gay,
Let life be like our song."

Would our lives be like the jingle
Of the happy, merry bells,
If sorrow nor crime could mingle
Their sad and deep-toned knells?

Could our lives be pure as snowflakes
O'er which the sleigh-bells glide,
Could we of sin and sorrow know
Naught on life's rough tide;

Could we, as the fairy snowflakes,
Dance carelessly along,
Heeding nothing but the murmur
Of the sleigh-bells' happy song.

Dance carelessly along to where
We find infinite rest
In the clear, translucent loveliness
Of a pure, snowflake-like breast.

If the wheels of vice and rankness
Could not glide o'er fallen snow,
Its beauty would be more complete
Than high, now lying low.

Could the gilded sun of passion
Never dart its poison gleam
To melt the pure transparency
Into a slushy stream

Ah! then the merry sleigh-bells would
Ring out a song of gladness,
A true, true song, so bright, so long,
With ne'er a touch of sadness.

The Poor Editor.

She stood on the piazza steps,
A creature young and fair,
With the moonbeams softly shining
On her bleached golden hair.

"Ma," she whispered, "has he come yet?
My newest mash, I mean;
He thinks I am the fairest girl
That he has ever seen.
I do not care for reading, but
I now read all I can,
And take such lots of trouble for
He's an editor man.

"He is so very well informed,
And so, I want to show
That I'm well versed in Shakespeare, Burns,
And all the rest, you know.
Oh, there he's coming through the gate."
She went and met him there,
He kissed her, as he softly stroked
Her wreaths of golden hair.

They talked of poetry awhile;
Said Milton was a dove!
And then the poets they forgot
And wispered tales of love.

He whispered: "Oh, I love you, dear,
Say, will you my bride?
Say, will you marry me, my duck
My darling and my pride?"
She answered, "Yes, I'll have you, dear,
I'll be your little wife,
And I'll stay with you forever,
To the end of your life."

Poor editor, poor editor;
She's got you safe and tight,
And though you soon must pitied be,
It really serves you right.
Upon him she tenderly gazed,
That editor beguiled;
They kissed each other once more and
The moon looked down and smiled.

Where Can Peace be Found?

BY MAUDE L. RADFORD, AGED 14.

"Oh! Where can peace be found," I cried;
"I've searched for it east and west,
I'm weary of this world's trouble,
I want to find peace and rest."

I asked the wild, mighty ocean,
Whose murmurings never cease,
"You know many, many things; you
Can tell me where to find peace."
And the restless waves answered:
"In forgetfulness there's peace."

I asked a bright, blushing flower,
"You surely can tell me," I said,
You have watched many, many scenes."
It modestly hung its head,
Then softly, gently whispered:
"In hope, in hope there is peace."

Then I turned to a little bird
That sang near me on a tree;
"You have seen many wondrous things,
You've travelled by land and sea."
And the bird sweetly sang forth:
"In song, in song there is peace."

I whispered softly to my heart,
"Thou knowest my secret well,
Thou must know where peace may be found,
Thou of all others can tell."
And my heart softly answered:
"In love, in love peace is found."

Then I spoke to my soul, and said
"Of these things thou should know best,
Thou knowest my remotest thoughts,
Thou canst aid me in my quest."
And slowly came the answer:
"There's no peace save in Heaven."

And I knew that my soul was right
Of all that had been given,
This answer was best. Peace abides
In no place save in Heaven.

A certain philosopher, recently deceased, used to divide the poor into three classes—the Lord's poor, the devil's poor and the poor devils. He claimed that the last classification was the most numerous of them all.

YOUNG FOLKS.

LITTLE JIM'S GOOD TIME.

Jim's parents had three children and J... was one of them. The two that were ... Jim were girls, one of them nine years ... age and the other eleven. Jim himself w... five and there was so much mischievous... ness wrapped up within him that I am sur... prised he did not explode.

They lived—this family of five—in a pla... sant, old-fashioned house in the country, and one day there came to visit them th... children's cousin Annie—a girl about a... old as Jim's sisters and one whom they ... both loved dearly; while as for Jim, he had once confidentially remarked that if he ever married anybody besides his mother, it should be Annie.

The girl's sleeping room was a big, airy chamber and Jim's a smaller one next to it. Both rooms opened into the wide hall and for ventilation's sweet sake the doors were always left open.

Soon after the children's bedtime, on the night of Annie's coming, Jim from his lonely pillow heard sounds of revelry in the next room—scamperings and scurryings and wild creakings of the bed-cord and charming pillow-fights—and envy burned in his bosom. He even forgot the dignity that dwells in boots and ignored the high estate of trousers and wished in his heart's core that he was a girl.

But by-and-by, after a due display of the charity that "suffereth long and is kind," his father came to the foot of the stairs and shouted "All abed!" and directly Jim heard a great silence in the next room, and directly again he was asleep. But later he awoke and as he lay thinking of the good time which the girls had had and he had missed a very bright idea put its head around the corner of his mind and whispered: "Wouldn't it be fun to play a joke on 'em?"

Jim never allowed a suggestion of this kind to pass unheeded. He rose with great caution, and arranging his bedclothes so that he could get into bed and be dreaming sweetly in the twinkling of an eye if he heard his father coming, he threw a sheet about himself and set forth.

He paused at the door of the girls' room and listened until he knew they were asleep, and then running lightly he made a flying leap and alighted on his hands and knees on the middle of the bed and straightway proceeded to hop about in the most extravagant manner.

Any girl in her right mind would awake under such treatment, and any kind of a girl would be frightened, even if she didn't awake, and before Jim had hopped many hops the quilt was drawn wildly up over the girls' terrified heads and held fast with a mighty grasp, while from beneath them, sounding muffled and far away, rose shrieks and wails and howls and appeals and protests, making night hideous.

Jim's father not being deaf was awakened. He rose from his comfortable couch and put on his dressing gown and a pair of soft slippers and set out upon a tour of investigation.

Just as he reached the head of the stairs Carrie uncovered her head and shrieked in a way to ruin her voice: "Pa, there's something on our bed!"

He had a grave suspicion as to what that something was, and going to Jim's bed and finding it unoccupied he took up a quilt and went into the girls' room.

Jim, imbued with such feelings as a war-horse has in battle, would not have noticed the approach of three tribes of Indians, and so it happened that when a blanket was thrown over him and he was tipped over upon his side, and the blanket was gathered up at the four corners and he was borne from the scene of his triumph, he knew not whence his trouble came.

He submitted gracefully to being carried somewhere, thinking impartially the while of dog-catchers and ghouls; but when he felt himself hung up by the four corners and knew that "it" was standing beside him and looking down at him, or rather at the situation he was in, he lifted up his voice in three far-reaching yells.

Then the thing that had caught him went away, and soon Jim's father and mother in their own room had laughed much, but subduedly.

Jim dared not scramble out of the blanket, and he dared not try to arrange himself more to his liking, for he feared that the string with which his captor had tied the quilt corners together might slip off, and he knew not whether he should fall feet or miles, for he might be suspended from the strong hook in the play-room or he might be hung from a buckle on the sword-belt of Orion.

His legs were hanging up one side of his narrow space and his body up the other, and on the whole he would have given his hoarded fifteen cents if he had never been born. But shortly he fell asleep.

His mother, thoughtful as women always are for those they love, reflected when she had laughed as much as she liked, that Jim would be so cramped up he couldn't be happy, and two silent figures stole out and placed the small sleeper in a more long-drawn-out position.

The girls, when the dreadful thing had gone from their bed, ley with their heads close together under the covers, wondering in whispers what it could have been, since it was too substantial for a ghost, too awkward for a beast and too fiendish to be human. They had an uncomfortable impression that it was yet in the room ready to pounce upon them; but after a time Carrie uncovered her head and saw one of little Jim's slippers on the floor and forthwith assumed that the transgressor was Jim. The girls had just begun to remark vigorously upon the total depravity of boys when Jim's three shrieks reached their ears from the the distance and they covered up their heads again, this time lastingly

They went to Jim's bed in the morning and found that there was nothing left of him but the place where he had been, and remembering his loud cries of the night-time were much relieved when his father discovered him hanging in a blanket from a portiere pole.

Jim did not tell the harrowing tale of the good time he had had; he was in doubt about how to begin it. The girls told their's however, and Jim didn't laugh as he listened; he didn't even smile. But all day he had a dazed air like a grasshopper drowned in its own "molasses."

A man who has not anything to boast of but his illustrious ancestor is like a potato—the only good belonging to him is underground.

General Rules for Letter Writing.

Always commence a letter with the most important subject that you desire to communicate, and write all that you desire to write concerning it, before you proceed to any other subject.

Leave a good margin at the left edge of the paper, and try to keep it straight.

Paragraph each subject upon which you write, as that will make it easier for the receiver to read the letter quickly.

Strive not to write unmeaning phrases, such as "So you see," or "You know," but use good, expressive words, avoiding many adjectives, which will make a letter ponderous, yet poor.

Lavater tells us:—

"Learn the value of a man's words and expressions and you know him. Each man has a measure of his own for everything. This he offers you inadvertently in his words. He who has a superlative for everything, wants a measure for the great or small."

Always bear in mind that written words are a very different affair from spoken words, as the manner which attends the speech alters their precise meaning. Many a sentence can be said with a laugh, that takes away its sting, while if written only the bare words will appear. And what you have written you are held answerable for. Therefore it is very needful to exercise much more caution in writing than in speaking, even to your nearest relations, and dearest friends.

If you request a correspondent to burn your letter, it is a sure confession that you are ashamed of what you have written. And frequently, merely because the request to destroy the letter has been made, the reader will consider it of importance enough to preserve.

When you write to some one asking information, with whom you are not in regular correspondence, be sure to enclose a stamp, and it is not amiss to enclose a stamped envelope directed to yourself.

Use good paper, and envelopes that fit it neatly, and fold the paper exactly straight. Sealing wax is now in universal use, and few ladies close their letters without it, using either a seal with their initials, or monogram, or a heraldic device. Gentlemen use plain red or green, or brown wax. Ladies may use any fancy colored wax they prefer.

When there are several of the same surname in a family, the wives rarely have their letters addressed with their own Christian names, but by those of their husbands, thus: Mrs. John Jones, Mrs. William Jones, Mrs. Sam Jones. And frequently they are addressed in the family circle as Mrs. John, Mrs. William, Mrs. Sam.

Whenever a doubt is in the mind concerning the rank or title of the person addressed, it is best to err on the safest side, and give higher rank, as deep offence has been taken by addressing a major as a captain.

The familiar style of closing a letter is "Ever thine," or "Yours truly," or "Yours devotedly."

The business style is "Yours respectfully."

The friendly style is "Yours cordially," or "Yours faithfully."

The old style, "Your humble servant," or "Your most obedient servant," is obselete. If desirous of being very respectful, you may write: "I have the honor to be yours most respectfully."

Many sticklers for etiquette in writing letters think that the name of the person addressed, should always be mentioned at the close of a letter. Thus: "I am, my dear Mary, yours most faithfully, John Jones."

But that is as the writer prefers, and not obligatory.

Few persons can write as well as they can converse, for the latter act is spontaneous, while the former is constrained; but therein lies the secret of good letter writing—i. e., the more naturally you write, the better will your letter read.

Daniel O'Connell and Biddy Moriarity.

Mrs. Moriarity, an elderly dealer in marine stores, who flourished about forty years since in Exchange-street, Dublin, was famous for a bad temper and a bitter tongue. On one occasion these, her special gifts were the subject of conversation in the hall of the Four Courts, and O'Connell undertook for a bet to silence the virago. The bet was accepted, and the great agitator having roused the old lady's wrath burst in upon her as follows:

O'Connell,—"Why sure your neighbors all know very well that you keep not only a hypoteunse, but that you have two diameters locked up in your garret, and that you go out to walk with them every Sunday, you heartless old heptagon."

Mrs. Moriarity—"Oh hear that, ye saints in glory—Oh, there's bad language from a fellow that wants to pass for a jintleman. May the devil fly away with you, you mitcher from Munster, and make celery-sauce of your limbs you mealy-mouthed bosthoon."

O'Connell—"Ah, you can't deny the charge you miserable submultiple of a duplicate ratio."

Mrs. Moriarity—"Go, rinse your mouth in the Liffey, you nasty tickle-pitcher; after all the bad words you speak it ought to be filthier than your face, you dirty chicken of Beelzebub."

O'Connell—"Rinse your own mouth, you wicked-minded old polygon—to the deuce I pitch you, you blustering intersection of scenting superficies."

Mrs. Moriarity—"You saucy tinker's apprentice, if you don't cease your jaw I'll—"

But here she gasped for breath, unable to hawk up any more words, for the last volley of O'Connell had nearly knocked the wind out of her.

O'Connell—"While I have a tongue I'll abuse you, you most inimitable peraphery. Look at her, boys, there she stands—a convicted perpendicular in petticoats. There is contamination in her circumference, and she trembles with guilt down to the extremities of her corollaries. Ah, you're found out, you rectilineal antecedent and equingular old hag. "Tis with you the devil will fly away, you similitude of the bisection of a vortex."

Overwhelmed with this torrent of language, Mrs. Moriarity was silenced. Catching up a saucepan, she was aiming at O'Connell's head, when he very prudently made a timely retreat.

"You have won the wager, O'Connell. Here's your bet," cried the gentleman who proposed the contest.

It is the fashion to talk about the baneful effects of reading trash. But trash is a merely relative word. What is trash to one man is not trash to another. His Last Sermon.

Burdened with years and labor, the old preacher lay upon his couch, waiting the summons of the messenger to call him across the river. Around him were gathered his children and brethren, ministering as far as they could to his every want. He lay silent for a time, when one of the watchers said: "He is going soon." Tears were flowing freely from many eyes. He roused a little, murmuring something none could understand. "His mind wanders in the last hour," said one. He seems to revive a little. "Raise my head," he said. "Is it time for the sermon? The lights are burning and the song seems to have died away." All voices were hushed as he continued: "Well, my text is from Jesus. 'In my Father's house are many mansions'—blessed words of promise. You poor, lowly ones who dwell in cabins, remember it is a mansion awaits you, and you poor, waiting ones, remember there are many of them. I promise my children to come home—but that mansion is my home. I'm too weary to preach long to-night, brethren. What is that I hear? The music should not begin before the preaching is over—strange voices, too—no, not strange, 'tis the wife of my early youth leading the choir—yes, and mother, too. I can't preach; let me lay down and rest!" He opened his eyes. In them was a far-away look, but what he saw none of the watchers could tell. Raising his hand, solemnly, he said: "Let us pronounce the benediction. May grace, mercy and peace abide—" An unintelligible murmur, and the hush of silence came, to be broken by the sighing and sobbing of the watchers. The old preacher had preached his last sermon.

Improve the Opportunity.

The announcement in another column Mr. Henry Davis, of 232 Yonge Street, is of great importance to the ladies. There are two questions which buyers always ask themselves, namely, where can I get the best goods at the lowest price. These questions can be satisfactorily answered by visiting Mr. Davis's store, at the present time. During stock-taking, which will be completed about the first of March, a big and particular drive is being made. Bear this clearly in mind, though, that while the prices are cut very low this sale is not a speculation to get rid of any stale goods, on the contrary the stock is exceptionally fine, and the firm only make this offer for the benefit of their customers. There is a general rise in wools, but for the present Mr. Davis has determined that his patrons will not feel the advance. Prove the truth of this announcement by visiting this great sale. What is there to go for? Whatever you want in wools and general fancy goods. You often find when you go to a first-class collection of anything, no matter what, that your notions are wrong. You had better go to Mr. Davis's store with a sort of general notion of what you want, and when you see the goods and learn prices, make it definite. This is intelligent buying. We advise an early visit, and you will be assured of satisfaction. Mr. Davis makes a specialty of orders received by mail and those living out of the city can rely on having their orders carefully attended to.

Persians and Englishmen.

The ancient Persians were truthful, and one of the manly accomplishments taught a boy was never to tell a lie. But modern Persia is such a hotbed of lies tht a man who does not lie is a phenomenon. Man seeks his opposite and the lying Persian is very fond of his truth-telling Englishman. Even the English telegraph clerks become favorites of Persian dignitaries and fanatical Mohammedan priests.

These clerks are scattered along the telegraph line, one at each station, and soon "take root" among the natives. They are invited to dinners, to marriage-feasts, and to picnics. What first attracts their Oriental friends to them is the strange fact that an Englishman does not lie.

Little by little the influence of "the man who tells the truth" begins to spread. Disputes are referred to him, for he is the only man in the place who will not take a bribe. He serves as an unpaid arbitrator, and as there are no fees in his court, he soon becomes a favorite, because an impartial judge.

Though a lone Englishman, in a fanatical Mohammedan district—his nearest fellow-clerk is miles distant—he soon finds himself a man of importance. The local Governor welcomes him to his house, and returns his calls. Several Khans, and even a prince or two drop into his station-house to smoke water-pipes and drink innumerable cups of weak tea. All because he is the one solitary man in the country who never tells an untruth or holds out an itching palm.

Ruin.

In life we constantly see ruin about us. We find ruin of business, ruin of character, ruin of health and ruin of happiness. Most of these evils are directly caused and controlled by man himself. This means that each one largely molds his own destiny. At least he is the important factor in making his own life a success. We do not, however, measure man's success by the sickening creed of dollars and cents; neither is the applause of the world a fair criterion. The evils found in men's lives could generally be avoided. Business wrecks could often be evaded by judicious management. Although, sometimes inevitable, yet a business failure is not fatal to one's existence. Destruction of character and health are by far the most serious draw-backs to a successful career. Building up a good name, results mostly from the effort of the individual. Let, however, the decayed germ of corruption enter, and ruin is almost certain. Character is like a dike, which is weakest where the water has once broken through. A good name is as essential a part of a successful life as good health. Sometimes a person is not responsible for a failure. Heriditary disease and weakness cannot be controlled by the victim. Generally speaking, good health can be preserved or gained by a simple obedience to natural laws. True happiness can only be ruined by loss of health or character. They are the great combination which unlocks the door and lets success escape.

True Politeness

The inbred politeness which springs from right-heartedness and kindly feelings, is of no exclusive rank or station. The mechanic who works at the bench may possess it, as well as the clergyman or the peer. It is by no means a necessary condition that labor should in any respect be either rough or coarse. From the heighest to the lowest, the richest to the poorest, to no rank or condition in life has nature denied her highest boon,—the great heart. There never yet existed a gentleman but was lord of a great heart. And this may exhibit itself under the hodden-gray of the peasant as under the laced coat of the noble.

"The true gentleman has a keen sense of honor,—scrupulously avoiding mean actions. His standard of probity in word and action is high. He does not shuffle nor prevaricate, dodge nor skulk; but is honest, upright, and straightforward. His law is rectitude,—action in right lines. When he says yes, it is a law; and he dares to say the valiant no at the fitting season. A gentleman will not be bribed; only the low-minded and unprincipled sell themselves to those interested in buying."

The Journalist.

The chief requisites for beginners in journalism may be summed up thus:

1. A good English education. Learn first to write English; I mean plain, straight, quiet Saxon, sturdy and lithe as a sapling. Let your Latin and Greek adornments come in afterward. Study the history of the world, or of Canada and Great Britain and Ireland; and study everything else that you conveniently can. Drill yourself in writing swift, sharp, vivid yet graceful accounts of everything that comes under your notice, putting it picturesquely but never at the cost of clearness and brevity.

2. Common sense.

3. Good judgment of the relative importance of subjects.

4. Obedience, patience, punctuality.

5. In spite of attaining to all these virtues don't be a prig. However much knowledge your brain may hold, never do or say anything which will lead the wise to charge you with being touched by the malady known as "big head;" conceit the wise call it.

Development of the Child's Mind

If any mother of thought and character was asked the question, What do you consider the most important quality to be developed in your child's mind? the answer without doubt would be Truth; for the corner-stone of character is truth, and there can be no true success without it. "Electricity cannot follow a broken wire, nor success a lying life." Without truth there is no development. And how many ways there are of proving, without speaking, that absolute truth is essential in the first steps a baby takes toward learning! Give him a box of blocks to build a house, and you can show him that, unless the first blocks laid on the floor are in line, the whole structure will be crooked; give him a slate, and you can explain to him that in making lines, if the first is not straight, not true, the rest will all follow the first, or the spaces will not be true; in short, you can make clear to him that, in copying any work, exactness is the very foundation of success, and but another name for truth.

The Successful Wife.

The successful wife must represent to her husband all the virtues—must be sympathetic and at the same time sensible. She must be bright, entertaining and agreeable at home as well as abroad and she must know how to preserve silence when it is desirable to hold her tongue, even though she is ready to burst with indignation. If she does not possess these qualities, let her cultivate them most assiduously. And their is no trait that is such a powerful factor in household harmony as assimilation—to become one in thought and purpose, to have kindred tastes and kindred wishes. The theory of the affinity of opposites was hopelessly exploded long ago. The picture of a blonde Desdemona clinging to a swarthy Othello is very pretty, but, if Othello's mind is out of tune with Desdemona the affinity cannot exist.

VALUABLE ARCHÆOLOGICAL DISCOVERIES.—Mr. J. W. Walker reports some valuable archæological discoveries upon the south side of Pine Mountain, Georgia. Upon the sides of the mountain, some 200 feet above the famous Gorundum Mine, he finds evidences of the site where the ancient inhabitants of that section fashioned their cooking utensils. Many of these utensils are but half finished, and are yet in place upon the cliff. This "find" is very instructive, as it is another proof of the manner in which these vessels were formed. Stone implements were used largely in this work, the vessel being nearly completed before final detachment from the rock.

Morning and afternoon gloves come in from four to six button lengths; evening gloves from fifteen to thirty.

WHY ONTARIO NEEDS TREES.

I should like, on this occasion, to suggest to your readers some considerations concerning the influence of adjacent woods, or even, in some cases, single lines of trees of sufficient height and density to retard and break the force of rapid winds, on the growth of vegetation in fields within the influence of their protection. In all the range of the various writers on these subjects, I have not found any who had hit on the explanation of the process of growth (or if they had, had not thought it worth illustration) which I am about to endeavor to describe. Yet it is, of all others, the most important and interesting in connection with this matter; and, by following certain facts we know to their direct sequence, we shall find that it must be correct. In the first place we know that derive what food the earth gives them through openings in what are called the spongioles of their roots. But the nourishment close to these soon becomes exhausted. How does the root receive the food which lies a little way from it? By means of the great carrier of plant food—water in motion. There are two movements of water through the soil which chiefly effect this, namely, that of gravity, by which it is attracted towards the centre of the earth, or rather to a certain depth within the crust; and that of heat, which draws it up to the surface and into the air. There are other movements; but these two all are acquainted with, and it is they which chiefly do the work And it is to be noticed that the provision of nature is that water will seldom carry plant food too deep, for most soils filter it too quickly. On the other hand, vapor does carry it upwards, as the aroma of a damp rich field when the hot sun comes from behind the clouds soon tells us. These two upward and downward movements of water through the soil carry the plant food within reach of the attracting influence which roots possess. This is the principal cause, apparently, why growth is so rapid and vigorous after a shower, an assisting but lesser cause being also the cleansing of the leaves and opening of their pores by the rain. Vegetation will, at such times—while, as remarked, the water is passing through the earth downwards and upwards (for, if watched, both these processes can be seen proceeding at one time) and during the longer succeeding period when, the first process chiefly concluded, the second, of vapor rising from the surface under the influence of the sun's heat, is still continuing—make very rapid progress indeed, so that it is common to say that the crops can then almost be seen to grow. The facts above-mentioned form a link in the chain of reasoning concerning the value of shelter to fields.

ALL PLANTS AND TREES

WHEN A SHOWER FALLS

in summer, as noticed above, all can see the effect in increased growth. This effect is, as said, largely owing to the passage of water through the soil, both in separating and preparing the atoms of plant food in the earth for nourishment to the growing plant, and in carrying them within reach of its roots. It is now to be noticed that where fields possess the shelter given by woods this valuable process will last much longer, for this reason, that the moisture will remain in the land, drying out slowly, while in an open country it probably would not last one-fourth of the time. We will understand this better if we consider how it is that the rapid passage of currents of air across a country carries off its moisture. One stratum of air passes across the ground, and receives from contact a certain proportion of the moisture in the soil. But that stratum does not continue to pass next to the ground, for the vapor of water which it has received being much lighter than air causes it immediately to rise and be replaced by a drier one, which in its turn, carries off its share. This process goes on, of course, when fields are sheltered, and is valuable to growth. But when they are not it proceeds with unnecessary rapidity, so as, especially in a dry time when every shower is valuable, to deprive the agriculturist of much benefit his crops might have obtained from the portion of rain which fell. A sheltered field is dried by a slow upward movement of vapor. An unsheltered one is dried by the rapid, half circular, or elliptic movement of successive waves of air—a natural drying machine, in fact. From the above any one will see the reason, so far as at present understood, why crops of all kinds do better, other things being equal, where sheltered by woods or rows of trees. The passage of water through the soil, downwards by gravity, upwards by the sun's attraction, is to the roots. That movement is much and injuriously shortened where currents of air sweep uninterruptedly over the soil. We will carry the description of the process of growth a little further, so as to give a fuller idea of the movement of moisture through earth and air. The plant or tree receiving nourishment by its roots receives also much water, which is the vehicle carrying it. By this it is carried to the leaves, and there exposed to the action of the air, which gives it all that portion—a very considerable quantity—of plant-food, which can not be obtained from the soil, but from the atmosphere. Thence the food is sent to all parts of the plant, but the water does not remain with it. Most of this has passed in vapor away from the leaves. How great the quantity of water thus passing into the atmosphere may be imagined from the fact that a sunflower has by experiment been found to emit three half pints, and a cabbage 25 liquid ounces daily. Forests transpire millions of gallons daily, and this great transpiration of cool vapor ascending, meeting clouds charged with warmer vapor, effects precipitation, as it is called, that is to say, rain, forests being thus the cause of the descent of much more moisture than they cause to arise. These movements of heat and moisture, acting on our earth, create and nourish all vegetable life.

THE GREAT MEANS OF BEARING PLANT FOOD.

WE GREATLY INTERFERE

with and check their beneficial course when we deprive a land of too great a portion of its forest protection. It is not at all too much to say that now in three-fourths of settled Ontario, it is time to make the rule here as it is in Norway, that for every tree cut down two shall be planted. The woods which shelter a country are as much a means of cultivation, in their way, as are the ploughs used to turn up the soil, and the experience of other lands shows us that if the forests be destroyed, a time will come when the plough be used in vain. I have devoted this letter principally to one point in [illegible] desirability of [illegible] not too rapid dry [illegible] giving the [illegible] of time the benefit of the chief natural assistant of growth—the passage of water and the vapor of water, one downward and the other upward—through the soil. It would be very desirable that county or township authorities could move in this matter so as to make the preservation of shelter general over considerable stretches of country. Individual efforts are very beneficial, but general ones would be so in a much greater proportion. I should be glad to receive and embody in the next forestry report any suggestions as to how this could be practically set about.

When to Shoot.

There was a farmer in Toronto the other day to find out just when the statues would justify him in shooting at a tramp. Said he:

"I went to the barn the other morning to take care of the stock, and three big tramps came down off the haw-mow held me up for $3 and kicked me before they walked off because I didn't have more. I got my shotgun, but on reflection I didn't shoot."

"I see."

"The other night a big tramp walked in on us and demanded food and a bed. I got down my gun, but as I didn't know the law I didn't shoot."

"Yes."

"T'other day my wife was coming from a neighbor's and a tramp met her and kissed her smack on the mouth. I heard her yell and got down my gun, but I didn't remember the statues before he got away. Now, then, there ought to be a line drawn somewhere."

"Yes, there is."

"Where can I legally pepper a professional tramp with bird-shot?"

"Well, if you order him off your farm and he won't go and you fear an assault aim at his legs and pull the trigger."

"And the law will back me?"

"Yes."

"Gosh all fish-hooks! but what a fool I've been! Why, I was licked regularly every two weeks all summer on my own farm by tramps, and every one of them got away with a hull hide! That's the law, eh? Then here goes fur a dollar's wurth of powder and shot!"

His Salary Didn't Go Up.

"I had been working for three years for one of our old-time wholesale houses," said a Torontonian who was calling up reminiscences, "and I finally concluded that I ought to have a raise of salary. I began on $4 per week and was raised to $6, but there it had stuck for two years. The head-man of the firm was a cold, stiff, austere man, who seldom recognized an employe and was known to be hard-hearted. I hesitated a long time before daring to approach him on the subject nearest to my heart, but one day I slid into the private office when I knew he was alone.

"'Well, sir,' he snaps out, short as pie-crust.

"'I—I came to—to—!'

"'Came to what, sir!'

"'I—I came to ask you if you—you didn't think——?'

"'See, here, William!' he said as he wheeled around on me, 'if my daughter loves you, and you love her, I've no objection to your marriage. Fix it up between you and don't bother me again.'

"The old Reynard! He had a daughter, but I had never spoken to her in my life, and he knew it. He answered me the way he did to stop me from asking for a raise of salary. It was a year and a half after that, before I was lifted to $8 per week."

Had Experience.

"You say that you have only been in this country three months," said a lady to an applicant to become mistress of the kitchen. "I'm afraid you haven't had experience. Were you at service before you came to this country?"

"Dade an' I wasn't, mim! Me feyther was wilthy, an' owned a cow an' two pigs, but I've had experience since I've been here. In the three months, I've been in twinty-six places."

Catarrh, Catarrhal Deafness and Hay Fever.

Sufferers are not generally aware that these diseases are contagious, or that they are due to the presence of living parasites in the lining membrane of the nose and eustachian tubes Microscopic research, however, has proved this to be a fact, and the result is that a simple remedy has been formulated whereby catarrh, catarrhal deafness and hay fever are cured in from one to three simple applications made at home. A pamphlet explaining this new treatment is sent free on receipt of stamp by A. H. Dixon & Son, 308 King Street West, Toronto, Canada.

"You can always tell a man who has once been a clerk in a hotel," says an exchange. General experience has always been that you can't tell him much. He thinks he knows it all.

Railway Disaster.

Thirty-two Men and Women Roasted to Death.

AN AWFUL OCCURRENCE IN THE VERMONT HILLS—A RAILWAY TRAIN PLUNGED INTO A CHASM AND FIRE CONSUMES THE CARS AND IMPRISONED PASSENGERS.

BOSTON, Feb. 5.—The G lobe's White River Junction dispatches tells the following story of the frightful accident to the Montreal Express on the Central Vermont Railway yesterday morning: No disaster more appalling in its happenings, more awful in its consequences, is recorded in the annals of New England railroading than the one which occurred on the Central Vermont Railway at White River bridge in the town of Endon, about four miles northwest of this place and half a mile this side of East Hartford, at 2.30 o'clock this morning. At that hour four passenger coaches of the Montreal express, heavily freighted with pleasure seakers bound for scenes of carniyal and fun, were hurled from the edge of an open Howe bridge, 600 feet in length, and while the train was running at full speed. were precipitated with the bridge itself down one of the wildest gorges of the Green Mountain State seventy feet on to the ice surface of the White River, and they were burned to ashes, cremating nearly forty human beings, killing a dozen more and seriously. if not fatally, burning and maiming a score of others.

The train for which this awful fate was in store is known as the Montreal express, and is made up nightly at this Junction, and consists of the remnants of two other trains, one of which leaves New York at 4 p. m., and the other Boston at 7 p. m. Both trains are known as Montreal express, and on reaching this Junction they are united and start north usually at 12.30 a. m, being due at Montreal about 9 a, m. Last night's train consisted of one passenger coach and one Pullman sleeper, the St Albans from Springfield; one sleeper, the Chicago, attached here, and one passenger coach and one Pullman sleeper, the Pilgrim; a smoker and baggage, mail and express car from Boston—seven cars in all. The train, which was nearly an hour and a half late, started from this Junction at a few minutes after 2 a. m. under the charge of Conductor Sturtevant. All the cars were well filled, the Springfield and Boston sleepers being filled with fun-loving people, bound for the winter sports at Montreal. The weather was clear but cold. The mercury stood at about twenty degrees below zero, and the moon was just piercing the hazy clouds as the train moved out of the station. The engineer knew his ground thoroughly. He had taken many a train safely over the winding route among the Vermont hills, and was determined to make up lost time. Over the four-mile straight way stretch west of this station the train sped along at the rate of forty mile an hour, and all on board had settled down to a nap, wholly unconscious of the terrible death awaiting them a few rods ahead, Suddenly the train dashed around a curve and up a slight garde to the long, wooden-deck Howe bridge which crosses the White River, seventy feet above the rushing waters. The river here passes through a deep, rock gorge, the jagged edge of the precipice on either side, with its perpendicular sides bordered by stunted pines, making a wildly romantic scene. At this point that train suddenly ended its journey. A broken rail 200 feet this side of the bridge is all that is left to tell the cause. Whether the train broke the frosty rail. throwing the cars from the track, whether the rail was broken before the train arrived, or whether some wheel gave away and snapped the rail is not known, and may never be known In an instant there was a jar a jumping of trucks over the railroad ties; the coupling between the forward sleeper and the four following cars broke, the engine. baggage and smoking cars passed on to the bridge and over in safety, but the other four cars jumped along over the ties to the end of the bridge, knocked out the heavy timbers which rested on the abutments and then toppled over—bridge, cars and human freight, fully eighty souls, all told, falling with a tremendous crash down the jagged precipice seventy feet, striking upon the frozen serface of the river. Then followed a scene which beggars all powers of human description. The splintered wreck took fire, and the dark gorge, from which the moon was hidden was also lighted up by the glare of burning coaches and bridge timber. The detached portion of the train was stopped and ran back to the scene as soon as possible. Those on board sprang into the deep snow and made their way as best they could down the steep banks to assist any in the wreck who were alive. Here and there a man or woman had succeeded in getting extricated from the debris by leaving part of his or her clothing behind and in spite of the intense cold and their half clothed conditions, were bravely rendering all the assistance in their power to rescue their less fortunate companions. Many were pinned beneath huge timbers beyond all human aid. The groans of the half conscious dying, the screams of the burning, mingled with the hoarse shouts of the trainmen and a few farmers who had arrived on the scene. Very little could be done to aid the injured and absolutely nothing towards quenching the flames. The ice on the river was three feet thick and no water could be procured. The sickening stench of burning human flesh soon arose from the seething mass. The cries of those enduring the mary rdon of being urned alive grew fainter and fainter. The injured who had been extricated from the ruins were soon conveyed to the neighboring farm house of Thomas Pingree, or stowed away in the smoker or baggage cars, and when the relief train arrived from this point the wreck had been entirely consumed. At least forty persons were killed outright or burned to death.

To The Electors
—OF—
SOUTH GREY.

GENTLEMEN.—In pursuance to the constitutional principle, that when there is any material extension of the Franchise, the House of Commons has been dissolved, and a new election will take place on Tuesday, 22nd February.

Having been chosen by the Liberal Conservative party as their Candidate, I beg to solicit your suffrage in the approaching contest.

If elected I shall give a fair support on all vital questions to the present Government; believing that it has shewn by its past record to be heartily in accord with the progressive spirit of the age, and that under its care the laws have been fairly and impartially administered, but on some questions I may be compelled to differ with it.

I shall favor the repeal of the present Franchise Act, and the substitution for it of Manhood Suffrage.

I believe there should be some radical change made in the constitution and functions of the Senate. or if this be not practicable then I should favor its abolition entirely.

The present fiscal system which gives protection to our manufactures has shewn itself to be successful and should be continued.

The depression existing in our agricultural interests and the small returns received by farmers from their investments and labors should engage the earnest and careful attention of our Legislators. Believing that the high rate of interest at which farmers are compelled to borrow money, causes a constant and large flow of their hard earnings to the capitalists of the old country, I think the Government should assume the control of the currency of the country, and that the necessary legislation should be passed to favor the establishment of Farmer's Banks, and the supply of cheap money to the agricultural classes.

Now that all the great public works rendered necessary by Confederation have been completed, I think the time has come to exercise the most rigid, careful and economical control of our expenditure, and to endeavor to carry out the affairs of the country without further increasing the public dept. Hoping my views will meet with your approbation and that you will favor me with your support and earnest co-operation.

I am, Gentlemen,
Your Obt. Servant,
DAVID JAMIESON

WATER IN ABUNDANCE.--Mr. Christopher Irwin of Artemesia, has been some 35 years on his farm without water on the place but this winter he determined to bore the rock (the great barrier) and secured the services of S. Wardell the noted rock driller, and to the delight of Mr. Irwin and family an abundant stream was struck at 20 feet in the rock.

QUICK RELIEF.—"One bottle of Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam cured me of a sore throat and loss of voice. One trial relieved me when all other medicines failed," says Miss J. McLeod, Belfountain, Ont.

CHANGED HANDS.—Mr. Will Tailor, who has so successfully run the Markdale Livery for nearly a year has sold the business together with horses, vehicles, stables, residence and property connected therewith to Mr. W. L. Young our popular bank teller, who took possession last Monday. Mr. Tailor leaves town in a few days.

AN OBSTINATE CASE.—"In the spring of '83 I was nearly dead, as everybody around my neighborhood knows. My trouble was caused by obstinate constipation. One bottle of Burdock Blood Bitters cured me entirely." This statement is made by Walter Stinson, of Gorrie, Ont.

MR. T. H. CARR, who has been purchasing large quantities of lumber of all kinds on the main line of the C. P. R., is now "holding forth" at the Markdale House. We understand he intends buying largely next season and shipping to Toronto and other points. Mr. C. is, we believe a strictly honorable man in all his business transactions.

A FAIR PROPOSITION.—There could be no offer more fair than that of the proprietors of Hagyard's Yellow Oil, who have long offered to refund every cent expended for that remedy if it fails to give satisfaction on fair trial for rheumatism, neuralgia, sore throat and all painful complaints.

WE were favored last week with a copy of the weekly Calgary Herald, of which Mr. Alex. Lucas brother of our banker, is business manager. The paper shows enterprise and vim on the part of its publisher. A remarkable feature in its advertising department is the number of Ranch adv's, no less than 23 in the one paper, each one with a cut of an animal bearing the owners particular brand.

HE SHOOK IT,—"I was subject to ague for two or three seasons, which nothing could eradicate until I tried Burdock Blood Bitters since which time, four years, I have had no return of the disease." W. J. Jordan, Strange Ont.

AN amusing story is told us of the experience of an Orangeville young man who conceived the novel idea of going down the toboggan slide on an iron scoop shovel. Mounting the shovel with his legs astride the handle, the descent began—also the fun. As the speed increased, the shovel warmed up by the friction, and its rider was soon actuated by an irresistible impulse to dismount, but he had a through ticket that allowed no stop-offs. At the end of the trip he was carried home, and is said to be now taking his meals in a standing position.—Shelburne Economist.

JOYFUL NEWS.—It is certainly glad tidings to the poor invalid to be informed of a remedy that will give prompt and sure relief in case of painful suffering. Such a remedy is Hagyard's Yellow Oil, adapted for internal and external use in all aches, pains, lameness and sorness. It cures rheumatism, neuralgia sore throat, croup and all inflammatory pains.

A PROFIT TO ALL.—"Sometimes," a subscriber says "your paper carries too many advertisements." This objection will be heard from some, though there are more than three columns of reading matter to one of advertising. To such persons it can be said, "if you will read those advertisements carefully through each week you will find that they will profit you in cash, far more in the course of the year, than the amount of money which the paper costs you, and if you care anything for the welfare of your town you ought to be glad to see them, for they are every week telling the adjoining towns and those beyond of the advantages of coming to this locality to buy and sell."

A WONDERFUL ORGAN.—The largest organ and one that plays a controlling part on the health of the body is the liver. If torpid or inactive the whole system becomes diseased. Dr. Chase's Liver Cure is made specially for Liver and Kidney diseases, and is guaranteed to cure. Receipe book and medicine $1. Sold by all Druggists.

MARKDALE MARKETS.—Fall wheat 75 to 76 cents; spring wheat 75 to 76; barley 30 to 53; peas 46; oats 28; butter 15 to 17; eggs 16; potatoes 50 per bag; pork 5.25; hides 7.50.

Flesherton.

From our own correspondent.

Miss Jennie McGarry (under the auspices of the W. C. T. U. here) was greeted by a good house on Wednesday evening last and all were highly pleased with the literary evening. Miss McGarry has a well trained voice, as an elocutionist has few equals. Misses Armstrong and Vandusen in Solos, each were well received, Miss Vanduren sang very sweetly. A. R. Fawcett, Esq., displayed the badge of an honorary member of the W. C. T. U. and was by the President of the Society called to the chair.

Monday's fair for this month was unusually small, not many cattle out also a slim attendance of buyers.

Our township fathers met on Monday in the Town Hall usual routine.

A grand Rally so say the Conservatives in Flesherton on Saturday afternoon next, a Mass Meeting in the Town Hall at 2 p. m. Several good speakers expected. Come Mr. Editor and hear what they have to say.

Professor Morgan, Fairy and their Company, expect to put on the boards "Little Red Riding Hood" on Friday evening next, in the Town Hall here.

Maxwell.

On Friday night, a social in aid of church funds, was held at Mr. Wm. Milne's. A beautiful night, a large attendance and an excellent host contributed to make the evening a pleasant one to all. About twelve o'clock by request of the host, the company sang "Auld Lang Syne" and then dispersed to their homes well pleased with the evenings entertainment,

As an evidence of gratitude for his faithful service as pastor, the congregation of the Pasbyterian church in Maxwell presented Rev. Mr. D'Argent with a fine bearskin coat.

It having been announced a week ago last Sabbath that Mr. Gordon would preach in the Methodist Church last Sabbath evening, at the appointed time, the church was crowded. Mr. Gordon took as his text, Acts IV. 18, and the remarks following will not soon be forgotten by those present. WHIZ

FREE TRADE.

The reduction of internal revenue and the taking off of revenue stamps from Proprietary Medicine, no doubt has largely benefitted the consumers, as well as relieving the burden of home manufactures. Especially is this the case with Green's August Flower and Boschee's German Syrup as the reduction of twenty six cents per dozen, has been added to increase the size of the bottle containing these remedies, thereby giving one-fifth more medicine in the 75 cent size, The August Flower for Dyspepsia and Liver Complaint and the German Syrup for Cough and Lung troubles, have perhaps, the largest sale of any medicine in the world. The advantage of increased size of the bottle will be greatly appreciated by the sick and afflicted, in every town and of village civilized countries. Sample bottles for 10 cents remain the same size. E. G. W.

The Blindman's World.

(CONCLUDED.)

Poor blindfolded creatures that you are, cringing at every step in apprehension of the stroke that perhaps is not to fall till old age, never raising a cup to your lips with the knowledge that you will live to quaff it, never sure that you will meet again the friend you part with for an hour, from those hearts no happiness suffices to banish the chill of an ever present dread, what idea can you form of the God-like security with which we enjoy our lives and the lives of those we love! You have a saying on earth 'To-morrow belongs to God;' but here to-morrow belongs to us, even as to-day. To you, for some inscruptable purpose, he sees fit to dole out life moment by moment, with no assurance that each is not to be the last. To us he gives a lifetime at once, fifty, sixty, or seventy years,—a divine gift indeed. A life such as yours would, I fear, seem of little value to us; for such a life, however long, is but a moment long, since that is all you can count on." "And yet," I answered, "though knowledge of the duration of your lives may give you an unenviable feeling of confidence while the end is far off, is that not more than offset by the daily growing weight with which the expectation of the end, as it draws near, must press upon?" "On the contrary," was the response, "death, never an object of fear, as it draws nearer becomes more and more a matter of indifference to the moribund. It is because you live in the past that death is grievous to you. All your knowledge, all your affections, all your interests, are rooted in the past, and never dwell upon it, and on that account, as life lengthens, it strengthens its hold on you, and memory becomes a more precious possession. We, on the contrary, despise the past, and never dwell upon it. Memory with us, far from being the morbid and monstrous growth it is with you, is scarcely more than a rudimentary faculty. We live wholly in the future and the present. What with foretaste and actual taste, our experiences, whether pleasant or painful, are exhausted of interest by the time they are past. The accumulated treasures of memory, which you relinquish so painfully in death, we count no loss at all. Our minds being fed wholly from the future, we think and feel only as we anticipate; and so, as the dying man's future contracts, there is less and less about which he can occupy his thoughts. His interest in life diminishes as the ideas which it suggests grow fewer, till a the last death finds him with his mind a tabula rasa, as with you at birth. In a word, his concern with life is reduced to a vanishing point before he is called on to give it up. In dying he leaves nothing behind." "And the after-death," I asked,—"is there no fear of that?" "Surely," was the reply, "it is not necessary for me to say that a fear which affects only the more ignorant on Earth is not known at all to us, and would be counted blasphemous. Moreover, as I have said, our foresight is limited to our lives on this planet. Any speculation beyond them would be purely conjectural, and our minds are repelled by the slightest taint of uncertainty. To use the conjectural and the unthinkable may be called almost the same.

"But even if you do not fear death for itself," I said, "you have hearts to break. Is there no pain when the ties of love are sundered?" "Love and death are not foes on our planet," was the reply. "There are no tears by the bedsides of our dying. The same beneficent law which makes it so easy for us to give up life forbids us to mourn the friends we leave, or them to mourn us. With you it is the intercourse you have had with friends that is the source of your tenderness for them. With us it is the anticipation of the intercourse we shall enjoy which is the foundation of fondness. As our friends vanish from our future with the approach of their death, the effect on our thoughts and affections is as it would be with you if you forgot them by lapse of time. As our dying friends grow more and more indifferent to us, we, by the operation of the same law of our nature, become indifferent to them, till at the last we are scarcely more than kindly and sympathetic watchers about the beds of those who regard us equally without keen emotions. So at last God gently unwinds instead of breaking the bands that bind our hearts together, and makes death as painless to the surviving as to the dying. Relations meant to produce our happiness are not the means also of torturing us, as with you. Love means joy, and that alone, to us, instead of blessing our lives for a while only to desolate them later on, compelling us to pay with a distinct and separate pang for every thrill of tenderness, exacting a tear for every smile." "There are other partings than those of death. Are these, too, without sorrow for you?" I asked. "Assuredly," was the reply. "Can you not see that so it must needs be with beings freed by foresight from the disease of memory? All the sorrow of parting, as of dying, comes with you from the backward vision which precludes you from beholding your happiness till it is past. Suppose your life destined to be blessed by a happy friendship. If you could know it beforehand, it would be a joyous expectation, brightening the intervening years and cheering you as you traversed desolate periods. But no; not till you meet the one who is to be your friend do you know of him. Nor do you guess even then what he is to be to you, that you may embrace him at first sight. Your meeting is cold and indifferent. It is long before the fire is fairly kindled between you, and then it is already time for parting. Now, indeed, the fire burns well, but henceforth it must consume your heart. Not till they are dead or gone do you fully realize how dear your friends were and how sweet was their companionship. But we—we see our friends afar off coming to meet us, smiling already in our eyes, years before our ways meet. We greet them at first meeting, not coldly, not uncertainly, but with exultant kisses, in an ecstasy of joy. They enter at once into the full possession of hearts long warmed and lighted for them. We meet with that delirium of tenderness with which you part. And when to us at last the time of parting comes, it only means that we are to contribute to each other's happiness no longer. We are not doomed, like you, in parting, to take away away with us the delight we brought our friends, leaving the ache of bereavement in its place, so that their last state is worse than their first. Parting here if like meeting with you, calm and unimpassioned. The joys of anticipation and possession are the only food of love with us, and therefore Love always wears a smiling face. With you he feeds on dead joys, past happiness, which are like the sustenance of sorrow. No wonder love and sorrow are so much alike on earth. It is a common saying among us that, were it not for the spectacle of the earth, the rest of the worlds would be unable to appreciate the goodness of God to them; and who can say that this is not the reason the piteous sight is set before us?"

"You have told me marvelous things," I said, after I had reflected. "It, is, indeed, but reasonable that such a race as yours should look down with wondering pity on the Earth. And yet, before I grant so much, I want to ask you one question. There is known in our world a certain sweet madness, under the influence of which we forget all that is untoward in our lot, and would not change it for a god's. So far is this sweet madness regarded by men as a compensation, and more than a compensation, for all their miseries that if you know not love as we know it, if this loss be the price you have paid for your divine foresight, we think ourselves more favored of God than you. Confess that love, with its reserves, its surprises, its mysteries, its revelations, is necessarily incompatible with a foresight which weighs and measures every experience in advance." "Of love's surprises we certainly know nothing," was the reply. "It is believed by our philosophers that the slightest surprise would kill beings of our constitution like lightning; though of course this is merely theory, for it is only by the study of earthly conditions that we are able to form an idea of what surprise is like. Your power to endure the constant buffetings of the unexpected is a matter of supreme amazement to us; nor, according to our ideas, is there any difference between what you call pleasant and painful surprises. You see, then, that we cannot envy you these surprises of love which you find so sweet, for to us they would be fatal. For the rest, there is no form of happiness which foresight is so well calculated to enhance as that of love. Let me explain to you how this befalls. As the growing boy begins to be sensible of the charms of women, he finds himself, as I dare say it is with you, preferring some type of face and form to others. He dreams oftenest of fair hair, or may be of dark, of blue eyes or brown. As the years go on, his fancy, brooding over what seems to it the best and loveliest of every type, is constantly adding to this dream-face, this shadowy form, traits and lineaments, hues and contours, till at last the picture is complete, and he becomes aware that on his heart thus subtly has been depicted the likeness of the maiden destined for his arms.

"It may be years before he is to see her, but now begins with him one of the sweetest offices of love, one to you unknown. Youth on earth is a stormy period of passion, chafing in restraint or rioting in success. But the very passion whose awakening makes this time so critical with you is here in reforming and educating influence, to whose gentle and potent sway we gladly confine our children. The temptations which lead your young men astray have no hold on a youth of our happy planet. He hordes the treasures of his heart for its coming mistress. Of her alone he thinks, and to her all his vows are made. The thought of licence would be treason to his sovereign lady, whose right to all the revenues of his being he joyfully owns. To rob her, to abate her high prerogatives, would be to impoverish, to insult, himself for she is to be his, and her honor, her glory, are his own. Through all this time that he dreams of her by night and day, the exquisite reward of his devotion is the knowledge that she is aware of him as he of her, and that in the inmost shrine of a maiden heart his image is set up to recieve the incense of a tenderness that needs not to restrain itself through fear of possible cross or separation.

"In due time their converging lives come together. The lovers meet, gaze a moment into each other's eyes, then throw themselves on the other's breast. The maiden has all the charms that ever stirred the blood of an earthly lover, but there is another glamour of the future. In the blushing girl her lover sees the fond and faithful wife, in the blithe maiden the patient, pain-consecrated mother. On the virgin's breast he beholds his children. He is prescient, even as his lips take the first-fruits of hers, of the future years during which she is to be his companion, his ever-present solace, his chief portion of God's goodness. We have read some of your romances describing love as you know it on Earth, and I must confess, my friend, we find them very dull.

"I hope," he added, as I did not at once speak, "that I shall not offend you by saying we find them so objectionable. Your literature possesses in general an interest for us in the picture it presents to the curiously inverted life which the lack of foresight compels you to lead. It is a study especially prized for the development of the imagination, on account of the difficulty of conceiving conditions so opposed to those of intelligent beings in general. But our women do not read your romances. The notion that a man or woman should ever conceive the idea of marrying a person other than the one whose husband or wife he or she is destined to be is profoundly shocking to our habits of thought. No doubt you will say that such instances are rare among you, but if your novels are faithful pictures of your life, they are at least not unknown. That these situations are inevitable under the conditions of earthly life we are well aware, and judge you accordingly; but it is needless that the minds of our maidens should be pained by the knowledge that there anywhere exists such travesties upon the sacredness of marriage as possible.

"There is, however, another reason why we discourage the use of your books by our young people, and that is the profound effect of sadness, to a race accustomed to view all things in the morning glow of the future, of a literature written in the past tense and relating exclusively to things that are ended."

"And how do you write of things that are past except in the present tense?" I asked. "We write of the past when it is still the future, and of course in the future tense," was the reply. "If our historians were to wait till after the events to describe them not alone would nobody care to read about things already done but the histories themselves would probably be inaccurate; for memory, as I have said, is a very slightly developed faculty with us, and quite too indistinct to be trustworthy. Should the Earth ever establish communication with us, we will find our histories of interest; for our planet, being smaller, cooled and was peopled ages before yours, and our astronomical records contain minute accounts of the earth from the time it was a fluid mass. Your geologists and biologists may yet find a mine of information here."

In the course of our conversation it came out that, as a consequence of foresight, some of the commonest emotions of human nature are unknown on Mars. They for whom the future has no mystery can, of course, know neither hope nor fear. Moreover, every one being assured what he shall attain to and what not, there can be no such thing as rivalship, or emulation, or any sort of competition in any respect; and therefore all the brood of heart-burnings and hatreds engendered on Earth by the strife of man with man, is known to the people of Mars, save from the study of our planet. When I asked if there were not after all, a lack of spontaneity, of sense of freedom, in leading lives fixed in all details beforehand, I was reminded that there was no difference in that respect between the lives of the people on earth and of Mars, both alike being according to God's will in every particular. We knew that will only after the event, they before,—that was all. For the rest, God moved them through their wills as he did us, so that they had no more sense of compulsion in what they did than we on Earth have in carrying out an anticipated line of action, in cases where our anticipations chance to be correct. Of the absorbing interest which the study of the plan of their future lives possessed for the people of Mars my companion spoke eloquently. It was, he said, like the fascination of a mathematician of a most elaborate and exquisite demonstration, a perfect algebraical equation with the glowing realities of life in place of figures and symbols.

When I ask if it never occurred to them to wish their futures different, he replied that such a question could only have been asked by one from the earth. No one could have foresight, or clearly believe that God had it, without realizing that the future is as incapable of being changed as the past. And not only this, but to foresee events was to foresee their logical necessity so clearly that to desire them different was as impossible as seriously to wish that two and two made five instead of four. No person could ever thoughtfully wish anything different, for so closely are all things, the small with the great, woven together by God that to draw out the smallest thread would unravel creation through all eternity.

While we had talked the afternoon had waned, and the sun had sunk below the horizon, the roseate atmosphere of the planet imparting a splendor to the cloud coloring, and a glory to the land and sea scape, never paralleled by an earthly sunset. Already the familiar constellations appearing in the sky reminded me how near after all, I was to the Earth, for whith the unassisted eye I could not detect the slightest variation in their position. Nevertheless, there was one wholly novel feature in the heavens, for many of the host of asteroids which circle in the zone between Mars and Jupiter were vividly visible to the naked eye. But the spectacle that chiefly held my gaze was the Earth, swimming low on the verge of the horizon. Its disc, twice as large as that of any star orplanet as seen rom the earth, flashed with a brilliancy like that of Venus. "It is, indeed, a lovely sight," said my companion, "although to me always a melancholy one from the contrast suggested between the radiance of the orb and the benighted condition of its inhabitants. We call it 'The Blindman's World.'" As he spoke he turned toward a curious structure which stood near us, though I had not before particularly observed it. "What is that?" I asked. "It is one of our telescopes," he replied. "I am going to let you take a look, if you choose, at your home, and test for yourself the powers of which I have bosted;" and having adjusted the instrument to his satisfaction, he showed me where to apply my eye to what answered to the eye-piece.

I could not repress an exclamation of amazement, for truly he had exaggerated nothing. The little college town which was my home lay spread out before me, seemingly almost as near as when I looked down upon it from my observatory windows. It was early morning, and the village was waking up. The milkmen were going their rounds, and workmen, with their dinner-pails, were hurrying along the streets. The early train was just leaving the railroad station. I could see the puffs from the smoke-stack, and the jets from the cylinders. It was strange not to hear the hissing of the steam, so near I seemed. There were the college buildings on the hill, the long rows of windows flashing back the level sunbeams. I could tell the time by the college clock. It struck me that there was an unusual bustle around the buildings, considering the earliness of the hour. A crowd of men stood about the door of the observatory, and many others were hurrying across the campus in that direction. Among them I recognized President Byxbee, accompanied by the college janitor. As I gazed they reached the observatory, and, passing through the gronp about the door, entered the building. The president was evidently going up to my quarters. At this it flashed over me quite suddenly that all this bustle was on my account. I recalled how it was that I came to be on Mars, and in what condition I had left affairs in the observatory. It was high time I were back there to look after myself.

* * * * * * *

Here abruptly ended the extraordinary document which I found that morning on my desk. That it is the authentic record of the conditions of life in another world which it purports to be I do not expect the reader to believe. He will no doubt explain it as another of the curious freaks of somnambulism set down in the books. Probably it was merely that, possibly it was something more. I do not pretend to decide the question. I have told all the facts of the case, and have no better means for forming an opinion than the reader. Nor do I know, even if I fully believed it the true account it seems to be, that it would have affected my imagination much more strongly than it has. That story of another world has, in a word, put me out of joint with ours. The readiness with which my mind has adapted itself to the Martial point of view concerning the Earth has been a singular experience. The lack of foresight among the human faculties, a lack I had scarcely thought of before, now impresses me, ever more deeply, as a fact out of harmony with the rest of our nature, belying its promise,—a moral mutilation, a deprivation arbitrary and unaccountable. The spectacle of a race doomed to walk backward, beholding only what has gone by, assured only of what is past and dead, comes over me from time to time with a sadly fantastical effect which I cannot describe. I dream of a world where love always wears a smile, where the partings are as tearless as our meetings, and death is king no more. I have a fancy, which I like to cherish, that the people of that happy sphere, fancied though it may be, represent the ideal and normal type of our race, as perhaps it once was, as perhaps it may yet be again.

RIFT AND SPRAY,

OR,

LOVE AND VENGEANCE AMONG THE SMUGGLERS.

THE MOST FASCINATING OCEAN ROMANCE SINCE THE DAYS OF COOPER AND MARYATT.

CHAPTER XXV.—(CONTINUED.)

The boy looked dubiously at the captain, as though he scarcely comprehended what he meant, and then sidled off with a puzzled expression, as if he rather felt sorry that he had whistled than not. There was a fine, frank, open look about the boy's brow, and Captain Morton paused and beckoned to him.

The boy marched up to him at once.

"What is your name?"

"Charlie."

"Have you a mother?"

Tears started to the boy's eyes, which he dashed off with the back of his hand, and then said, hastily:

"Dead!"

"A father?"

The boy turned and looked toward the sea.

"Yes. Thereaway fishing. I don't see him often."

"Charlie, I have a little girl—my own little child. I am looking for her. Have you seen here such a one? She is tall, rather—has auburn hair—darker than auburn, and she moves so lightly."

"Auburn!" said the boy, with a puzzled look, "what's that? Grace has such beautiful hair; it is like the sea-weed right away down at the bottom of the bay—the sea-weed that won't ever come up—you may see it in the water, waving all about like Grace's hair; but that which comes up is so different."

"Grace—Grace! You—come, boy, you will tell me? Hush! hush! one moment."

There was a short, quick respiration on the part of Captain Morton, and he pressed his hands upon his heart for a moment or two before he could still the emotion that had come over him. Then he spoke again:

"You have seen her here, boy? You have seen such a young creature here?"

"Oh, yes, I know Grace! She is Grace Dolan."

"No, no!"

"Oh, yes! she is, indeed. You don't know, but I do. She and Gerald used often to come here; but they don't now so much, and Grace was crying when she came last."

"When was that?"

The boy shook his head.

"I don't seem to recollect just when it was. I'm coming—well, I'm coming."

The boy's eyes were directed to the cottage of Dolan and Captain Morton now, by following the their gaze, saw that some one at the window was shaking an arm threateningly at the boy. The captain then nodded and smiled to Charlie and leisurely walked up to the cottage door.

"Now, calm, calm, calm!" he said to himself. "I must not let myself be oppressed by too much feeling or those who have none will use it as a weapon against me that will soon wound my chart."

He tapped at the door and it was instantly opened by no other than Mrs. Wagner herself, who had a defiant, "well, what now?" sort of look about her that let the captain see she was prepared for resistance.

"Mrs. Wagner," said Captain Morton.

"Well, sir!"

"I want to speak to you."

"You have your tongue, then, I fancy."

"Out of my way, woman!" said the captain, with a sudden fierceness, that alarmed Mrs. Wagner. "I wonder I have patience with your insolence and don't call my men and lock you up at once. Out of the way—a chair! Be quick! Insolent, indeed! Will you be quick? I said a chair! Oh, dust it! Place it there—that will do."

Mrs. Wagner obeyed Captain Morton's orders by a sort of instinct. He had cowed her.

"What?" she said, "who—"

"Silence!"

She was silent on the moment.

"Shut the door."

"Yes, sir!"

"Where's the girl you call Grace? Be quick!"

"Grace?"

"Now dare you repeat my words without answering me? Be quick—where is she?"

The voice in which Captain Morton spoke was such a roar that it filled the little cottage and terrified Mrs. Wagner.

"Grace Dolan?"

"No!" said Captain Morton. "You know that's a lie! Where his she? Quick! By the Heaven above us!"

He rose from his chair and laying hold of it dashed it to pieces against the floor of the cottage.

"She is not here—I declare, sir, she is not here," said Mrs. Wagner.

"Not here. Fire and fury, woman! If you don't fetch her at once—"

"I can't, sir—Oh I can't!"

"Why? Why?" roared the captain.

"Because she is dead!"

"Dead! Dead! Dead! Oh, Heaven! Too late—too late! Grace—my child—my own—my darling—dead! Oh, God! Oh, God!"

He sank to his knees on the brick flooring of the cottage and sobbed bitterly.

"Ah!" said Mrs. Wagner. "I thought so. Now, sir, if you have anything to say to me, you will perhaps alter your tone. Grace is not dead and I alone can restore her to you if you are her father."

"Not—not dead?"

"Certainly not. Get up, sir! Sit down! Do you hear me? Sit down, I say."

Captain Morton looked calmly at Mrs. Wagner.

"Woman," he said, "if you think to assume any power over me on account of what you may know of my long lost child, you are mistaken. I know—I can guess the feelings and objects of such as you. I will buy of you the information I seek and you must sell it civilly or I will manage to get it elsewhere, and, in that case, I will at once take you into custody."

"A truce, sir," said Mrs. Wagner. "I know all about the girl. She was wrecked from an American ship. Old Hutchins knows all about her, too, for she lived with him and his wife for a long time."

"I know that. Hutchins told me so and that Dolan took her from him. He is dead."

"Hutchins dead?"

"Yes. I was with him in his last moments and he told me all he knew. I now want my daughter, who is this Grace Dolan, as she has been called so long. If you aid me in getting at once possession of her you may almost name your own reward."

Mrs. Wagner reflected.

"America," she said, "and a thousand pounds."

"Agreed. Is my child here?"

"No."

"Where—where then? In any of these cottages? Speak to me! Tell me where she is! Or can you get her at once for me?"

"The money—"

"Is here—here in this pocketbook. Where is my child? Woman do not kill me by delay, now. Where is my child?"

"Wait here for one hour and you shall have her in your arms."

"An hour?"

"Yes; rather more than less. How am I to get to America?"

"To British America—Canada?"

"Well, I don't know."

"I will take you in my yacht and put you on board some outward bound vessel for their track well."

"But—but—"

"What more? What is it?"

"How do I know—you may get me on board your yacht and then you may land me anywhere and not give me the thousand pounds. How do I know?"

"How can I assure you? Stay. I will do one thing with you. See here!"

Captain Morton took from his breast pocket a small folded parcel, and upon opening it, it was found to be a flag.

"I will give you this," he said, "and I will write on it, "Captain Morton owes Mrs. Wagner one thousand pounds." You shall send this were you please, so that you may return it to me when I give you the thousand pounds, which I will do so soon as I place you on board of any vessel bound for Canada and my dear child is with me."

"Very well—wait here. No one will interrupt you. I will bring the girl to you."

"Be quick—quick as you can. I will pay you fifty pound for every five minutes you are here within the hour."

CHAPTER XXVI.—THE PIRATE CAPTAIN AT BAY.

"High time," she said; "high time. I will be rid of Dolan now, once and for all. I don't know anything about Quebec and Canada, but they are somewhere away from England. A thousand pounds! That will do with what I have got already from Dolan and with what I know pretty well where to lay my hands upon. That will do. He is past further hope. He means to betray the Rift. I am certain of it, though he won't tell me. Oh, I hate him now! I hate him! Let this father of the girl have the girl. That will spite Dolan—ha! ha! Then, if I can manage about the boy, too! Dear me. I was quite forgetting the boy. Now, we will see, Miss Grace, whether you can be found in the cave or not. I suppose you are there along with your great favorites, Gerald and that old Joseph! I hope he will be hung—yes, I should like him and Martin to be hung, and Dolan. It would be a great relief to my mind to hang Dolan—in chains, too—a gibbet—I should like to do that."

"Would you?" said Dolan, as he put his head in at the door of the room. "Would you, really?"

Mrs. Wagner did not scream—she was too horrified for that—but she stood like a statue, with her bonnet-strings in her hand, glaring at Dolan.

She was certainly fascinated by Dolan's look, as he very slowly came into the room, still keeping his eyes upon her—fascinated as people are said to be by the eyes of a serpent, and Dolan's movements as he crept up to her were reptile like.

"You would, would you?"

She had to speak.

"You would like to see me hung?"

A gurgling sound only came from the throat of Mrs. Wagner.

"Gibbeted—eh?"

"No—I—no. Mercy on me!"

"Ah!"

It was with something between a howl and a yell that Dolan sprang upon her and caught her by the throat. She fell to the floor in a swoon.

"What is that?" cried Captain Morton, as he opened the door of the room in which he was waiting. "What is that?"

There was no reply.

The room opened in the direction of the sound that Dolan had made, on to a little, dark passage, and it was from that again that the door of the apartment where Dolan and Mrs. Wagner were opened, and through which Dolan had appeared, to the surprise and the consternation of his guilty associate.

Dolan hardly permitted himself to breathe.

"I thought I heard a cry," said Captain Morton.

All was profoundly still now, and Captain Morton returned to the room. He thought he might be mistaken, and the natural dislike he had to intrude into the other departments of the cottage deterred him from prosecuting a search.

He sat down quietly to wait for Mrs. Wagner and Grace—as quietly as he could, with his feelings in such a tumult of expectation.

Then Dolan opened the door leading into the passage, and listened very attentively.

"Who is here?" he said. "What is it that can be here? Some one spoke—who can it be?"

He went and shook Mrs. Wagner.

"Wretch!" he said. "Wretch, tell me who is in the cottage?"

"Bah! I must see for myself. It will be worse for whoever it is."

Dolan crept out into the little passage, and crouched down close to the door of the room in which Captain Morton was. The key was in the lock on the inside, and it was accidentally so turned that it stopped the keyhole. Through the lock, though, on the other side of the entrance end, the key projected about the eighth of an inch.

Dolan tried with his nails to get hold of this slight projection and turn the key. He could not.

"Pincers," he muttered. "If I had pincers. Ah, yes! this will do it—this will do it!"

He took from his pocket a pistol-bullet mold. By opening their two concave portions, he had a kind of pincers, and he clutched the end of the key with them.

"That will do," he whispered faintly.

The key turned.

A slight noise which it made caused Captain Morton to spring to his feet.

"What is that?"

Dolan dashed away into the other room in a moment and closed the door noiselessly. He then took from his breast a pistol, and held it in his hand, with the muzzle pointed toward the door.

But Captain Morton did not seek him. He contented himself by merely opening the room door and looking out into the little passage.

"Nothing," he said. "The wind, I suppose!"

He closed the door again and sat down. Far away, then, flew his thoughts to his once happy, but now desolate—oh! so desolate—home in the New World—that home which he yet hoped to bring the sunshine of joy into by the presence of his long lost child. In imagination, he would hear the breeze among the majestic trees of his native woods and the aroma of the sweet flowers seemed to float about his senses.

Dolan crept out into the passage again. The pistol was now in his hand.

"Ah! A man. Ah!"

He had no difficulty now in looking through the keyhole of the door. There sat the bereaved father. A sharp, cold current of air came through the keyhole of the door, and Dolan's eyes smarted as he shifted his position so that first one and then the other glared into the room.

"A man," he muttered. "Who and what is he?" How much does he know? Too much, of course. There must be an end of him. I have gone too far to care about a life now. He has come here, and this place will be his grave."

Dolan covered carefully the lock of the pistol with the corner of the rough sort of coatee that he wore. He wanted to place it on full cock, and he was afraid that the click of the spring would reach the ears of the solemn and melancholy looking man who sat, all unconscious of his danger, in the next room of the cottage.

It was a very light sound that the lock of the pistol made, and Captain Morton did not hear it.

"Now," said Dolan.

He thought he could fit the barrel of the pistol in such a manner to the keyhole of the door that the bullet could be made to speed on its passage and reach the heart or brains of Captain Morton without the necessity of his (Dolan's) giving any alarm by opening the door even a crevice in width.

But he found that this would not do. The keyhole was too small, and besides, he lost all perception of aim when he placed the barrel of the pistol to it.

"No. That was a failure."

Then Dolan placed his hand on the lock of the door and slowly—oh, so slowly—turned the handle. He knew that it had an infirmity of creaking and he feared each moment that it would make some of its accustomed noises and startle the stranger.

No—all was still. Dolan had the latch free. He had nothing now to do but to push the door gently and it would open inwards.

Then Dolan nearly cried out aloud, for a shrill voice in the front passage of the little cottage called out:

"Mrs. Wagner! Mrs. Wagner! Here be some sojers a-coming down the lane! Mrs. Wagner! some sojers coming down the lane."

Dolan started to his feet, for he had been kneeling by the door of the room.

Captain Morton, too, started to his feet.

"What is it—what is it?" he cried.

Opening the door of the room in which he was, he found himself face to face with the boy he had met on the beach.

"What is it?"

"Sojers, sir. Where is Mrs. Wagner, sir?"

"She has gone—gone—I hardly know where, but it is on an errand for me."

"Oh, there he is!"

"Who—what?"

Round from the back of the cottage there darted a man and with extraordinary speed he ran down to the beach.

"Who is that?" said Captain Morton.

"Captain Dolan."

"Ah! Hold—stop, villain!"

Dolan, with astonishing speed, reached the margin of the sea. The tide had risen and one of the boats, that we have remembered as being on the beach, was afloat. He sprang into it in a moment and, seizing the oars, pulled off.

Captain Morton reached his own boat and, dashing into the surf, he boarded it and called out:

"That man in the galley—overtake him! Give me an oar! Pull—pull! We shall have him yet."

"Ay, ay, sir," said the sailor and the boat of the Nautilus shot through the water in pursuit of Dolan.

When I Mean to Marry.

BY J. O. SAXE.

When do I mean to marry?—Well,
'Tis idle to dispute with fate:
But if you choose to hear me tell,
Pray listen while I fix the date,

When daughters haste, with eager feet,
A mother's daily toil to share,
Can make the puddings which they eat,
And mend the stockings which they wear;

When maidens look upon a man
As in himself what they would marry,
And not as army soldiers scan
A sutler or a commissary:

When gentle ladies who have got
The offer of a lover's hand,
Consent to share his earthly lot,
And do not mean his lot of land;

When young mechanics are allowed
To find and wed the farmer's girls
Who don't expect to be endowed
With rubies, diamonds, and pearls;

When wives, in short, shall freely give
Their hearts and hands to aid their spouses,
And live as they were wont to live
Within their sires' one-story houses;

Then, madam, if I'm not too old,
Rejoiced to quit this lonely life,
I'll brush my beaver, cease to scold,
And look about me for a wife!

THE TERM "HORSE POWER."—The use of "horse power" as a measure of an engine's work came naturally from the fact that the first engines were built to do the work previously done by horses. John Smeaton, the builder of atmospheric engines before Bolton and Watt had introduced their more important machine, had already set the working power of a horse as equal to lifting a weight of 22,000 pounds one foot high in a minute. Bolton and Watt agreed to place their engines "for the value of one-third part of the coals which are saved by its use." They also increased the horse power to 33,000 pounds per minute, so that their engines were half-again as powerful according to their rate as those of their competitors. In this way they established the "horse power" as 33,000 foot pounds per minute, or 550 foot pounds per second.

Cornelius Driscoll, of Lower Cove, N. S., has passed his one hundredth year and will soon celebrate the first anniversary in the second century of his existence. He is still hale and hearty, able to eat a good square meal and do odd jobs about the house. Mr. Driscoll came from Baltimore, Ireland, over 50 years ago.

The brilliant illumination of the Stormont Cotton Manufacturing Company's mill at Cornwall by the first lighting of the Edison incandescent light startled the people of that town. The lighting up was a complete success and will be of immense benefit to health and comfort of the workers in the mill. The machinery is all in shape again and the mill is in full blast.

John J. Veitch was charged at the Police Court, Toronto the other morning, for coasting on Gerrard street hill. Sergeant Gregory tried to stop him, but he denied the right of the policeman to interfere with him, claming that as long as he kept off the sidewalk he had a right to coast. The Police Magistrate sustained his contention and dismissed the case. Veitch now intends to bring civil action against Sergeant Gregory, claiming damages for false arrest and imprisonment.

A cablegram received from Glasgow at Guelph recently announced to his sorrowing family the death of J. D. Williamson of that place. The cause of his death is not as yet ascertained. Mr. Williamson was for many years the leading merchant of Guelph, and was universally liked and respected. He leaves a large family, nearly all grown up; three of his sons manage his large dry-goods business, which has made itself famous in Western Ontario under the name of "The Lion."

An amusing incident occurred in Port Arthur the other afternoon. Two young men entered a grocery store and purchased biscuits, cheese, etc., for lunch. One of the party sat down on a box at the door to eat his share, and leaned contentedly back against a bulletin board on which an advertisement of various goods was written with chalk. When he finished his lunch and proceeded up the street his black coat bore an inscription of fresh eggs, good butter, cabbages 5c, potatoes 85c per bushel, choice confectionery, peanuts, bannanas, canned goods, etc.

A Peterboro' curler who has just played a closely contested "thirteen point" game gave the following figures to prove that it was hard work. In following and sweeping the stones, which was done with the most thorough fidelity, he travelled 5½ miles; a large part of it being on the run and sweeping with all a curler's energy. The playing of his stones represented the moving of over 2½ tons, and the length of the rink 42 yards, equivalent to moving over 99 tons 1 yard. Allowing that the stone be raised on an average two feet at each shot, he raised 4¾ tons one foot.

The residence of Wm. Smith, of Smith's Cove, N. S., caught fire at midnight. The old people were asleep in the lower part of the house and barely escaped with their lives, with nothing on but their nightclothes. Two boys slept upstairs, the eldest of whom when aroused found his brother in a dazed condition. While endeavoring to get his brother out of the building the floor gave way and the boy was precipitated into the flames and perished, while the other with much difficulty reached the window and jumped out, being very severely burned and also cut and bruised.

In the district of Gaspereaux, N. S., settled by 200 families, 71 persons average 77 years of age. In the adjoining polling section of Harborville, on the Bay of Fundy, there are living 90 persons aged from 70 to 90 years. Of these no less than twenty couples have been married and living together 50 years and upwards, beside 25 widows and widowers who were first married half a century ago. Probably no other settlement on the continent can boast of such a record of longevity. Of the twenty couples who have enjoyed 50 years of wedded life five of the husbands are brothers, viz. Joseph, James, Daniel, Bradford and William Ogilvie.

American papers have the following despatch;—The Hoadey gang of counterfeiters and a St. Paul detective by the name of Frank S. Dacre, who had been employed some months ago by the Canadian Government to capture this gang dead or alive, offering him $2,000 and all his expenses, had a terrible fight last Monday. Dacre came upon the outlaws, and in the fight with them James Pearson, Thomas Matthews and Thomas Doyle were killed. The rest of the band were captured by the mounted police. Dacre, the police say, displayed wonderful strength in the fight, fairly lifting one of the band in his arms and bringing him down with such a force as to kill him. Dacre is only twenty-six years old, was once on the Montreal police detective force, and was for five years a United States officer.

STATISTICS.

It is computed that at the present time the town population of Prussia amounts to 11,000,000, while the rural population is estimated at 17,500,000.

School-fees count for nearly 12s. a head in Scotland, against 10s. 6d. in England, and that notwithstanding that there is a far larger proportion of free scholars there than in England.

In ten years the consumption of raisins and currants in France has increased from about 6,000 to 65,000 tons annually. They are used in the manufacture of wine, and the liquor produced is declared to be perfectly wholesome, possessing many of the properties of wine made from the juice of the grape.

The number of horses exported from England to different countries in 1885 was 6,091, valued at £363,368, or an average of £59 13s. per head. Belgium was the largest buyer. Australasia, the smallest importer, gave the highest price, an average of £272 6s. 8d. each for 66 horses; while the Argentine Republic took 97 at an average of £210 17s.

The total area of green crops in Great Britain last year was 3,480,400 acres, or 41,000 acres less than last year's figures. Flax was grown on 3,000 acres. In the few localities where its acreage has slightly increased it is stated to be mainly experimental. The cultivation of hops has not been quite maintained, there being about 70,100 acres grown in 1886, as compared with rather more than 71,300 in 1885—a decrease of 1,200 acres, or nearly 1-8 per cent.

The death-rate of English troops for the whole of India in 1883-84 was 12.56 per 1,000, as against 10.88 during the previous year. In connection with this increase, it should be mentioned that the rate for the period 1870-79 was an average of 30 per 1,000, and that in the older days it was as high as 70. The returns for the native army are more favourable. The hospital entries show an increase of slight ailments, but the death-rate fell from 11.76 to 10.50. With regard to the civil population, the registration of vital statistics is reported to make but slow progress.

Within the last few years there has been a decrease in the number of sheep in Victoria; in 1879 there were 11,750,000 sheep in the colony, in 1885 there were 10,637,000. Notwithstanding the decrease, the export of wool has not diminished. In 1881 it amounted to 93,467,369 lb., valued at £5,810,148; in 1884, to 119,502,240 lb., valued at £6,342,877. The bulk of the wool goes to Great Britain. There were 1,096,354 acres under wheat in 1885, showing a decrease of 8,038 acres compared with 1884. The entire area under cultivation of all kinds in 1885 was 2,323,493 acres, showing an increase of 107,570 acres over the previous year. Over 4,000,000 bushels of wheat were exported in 1884, valued at £1,420,000.

Newspaper Favors.

A trade paper, speaking of the frequency of puffs asked for and received by small advertisers, puts a somewhat gray-haired chestnut into new form as follows: "Eight out of every ten persons who insert an advertisement, ask that a notice in the reading columns be given—thrown in, so to speak—with the other. There is only one man out of all the subscribers who takes any particular delight in that paragraph known as the notice, and that is the man whose name it contains, and he smiles in a sort of delirium of bliss. Now, when the editor goes out to buy he does not, after making his purchases, ask that $2 worth of articles be thrown in. The grocer would kick the man out of the store who habitually asked to have a pound of sugar thrown in for every quarter of a pound of pepper he puchased. The hardware man would be aghast if he was compelled to throw in a pound of nails for every ten cents, worth of putty he sold. The dry goods man would go out of business if he must put in a yard of cloth or a parcel for every bit of calico Maria Abigail Simpkins happened to purchase. The funniest thing in the "notice" business is that the large advertisers do not ask for the extra, the complimentary paragraph being merely given as an act of courtesy for their large trade in printers' ink, while the man who spends $1 a month has his feelings wounded if he does not receive a notice worth $2,50 in hard cash every time he favors the paper with his custom."

WISE AND OTHERWISE.

"No, sir," he said to the captain, "I am not seasick, but I am really disgusted with the motion of the vessel."

Before the wedding day she was dear and he was her treasure; but afterwards she became dearer and he treasurer.

An old clergyman once said to P. T. Barnum, "I hope to meet you in heaven." "You will if you are there," answered Mr. Barnum.

"I wish I was a public house," said a loving woman to her husband. "Why?" he inquired, with some degree of surprise. "O, because you would run in eighteen or twenty times a day to see me."

"If my dog doan' bite anything," explained a Gratiot avenue saloonist, "eaferypody say he vhas no good. If he bites sompody, den eaferypody says he must be killed. Seems to me dot dog doan' get some fair show."

A cobbler visited one of the large manufactories the other day, and for the first time in his life saw shoes made by machinery. "What do you think of that?" asked the foreman. "It beats awl," was the laconic and significant reply.

A little four-year-old, chubby-faced boy sat clenching his fingers around a silver dollar at the Sunday-school service at the Methodist Episcopal Church in Tyrone, Sunday afternoon, and later reluctantly surrendered it to the lady who collected the contributions to the Church funds, saying afterwards: "I didn't want to give it to Mrs. B: I wanted to give it to the Lord."

An amusing incident occurred at a Christmas tree at one of the colored churches in Elberton, Ga. As but few of the members could read or write, they selected a colored damsel who had "been to school" to write the names on the presents, which she readily consented to do. When the presents were distributed and the names called out, the assembly was greatly surprised to find that all the handsomest and most valuable presents had on them the name of the girl that did the writing. An indignation meeting was hastily held, and a redistribution of the presents ordered immediately.

BIRR, London Township, June 20th, 1885

I caught a cold in May, 1884, and was continually coughing and catching fresh cold, and having a pain in my side. I tried other medicines but was still getting worse until I tried Dr. Jug's Medicine in January last, and I had not used one bottle when I began to feel myself gaining. So I have used four bottles and now I feel well and strong.

LAST Wednesday night—or early the following morning—two men drove down Mill Street at a high rate of speed both under the influence of tangleleg, they had an upset or two, and as assistance at that time of night would be scearce, they might have broken their necks, or worse than that, might have injured the poor horse.

THE Canadian Fish question now being considered at Washington U. S. appears to occupy an important place in the minds of the public—why! just last week Jo. AMONG THE INDIANS.—"While my husband was trading in fure he came across an Indian who was taken to his lodge to die. He had inward pains and pains in all his limbs. He gave some Yellow Oil internally and applied it externally, and cured him. It also cured my husband of rheumatism, and I find it valuable for coughs and colds, sore throat etc." Mrs. A. Bosaw, Cook's Mills. Serpent River, Ont.

A BY-LAW has been passed by the city Council of Toronto, reducing the number of tavern an shop licenses for the coming year by 75. There will now be 150 tavern and 50 shop licenses granted in Toronto. This is a most decisive step against liquor.

HE FEARED NO FOE.—Nero fiddled when Rome was burning. Many now-a-days seem equally indifferent to danger by the manner in which they neglect ill-health. If taken in time, there is scarcely a chronic disease which Burdock Blood Bitters will not eradicate by its purifying, regulating powers.

ALMOST FATAL.—On Thursday the 3rd inst a little boy of Mr. Andrew Beattie's Artemesia, got hold of a bottle of Croton Oil and Iodine and, unnoticed by any, swallowed about a tablespoon full of the deadly poison. Had it not been that the terrible dose acted as an emetic, death would have been certain. Drs. Brodie of Markdale and Carter Flesherton were immediately summoned and we are glad to say the child is fully recovered, to the great delight of its parents.

Reasons why you should purchase Fluid Lightning in preference to all other remedies are Rapid result—cures instantly. It is easily applied—no trouble—no lost time. MISSIONARY SERVICES.—The annual missionary services of the Methodist Church of this place was held last Sunday. Rev. Jas. Hannon of Saugeen Indian Missior preached an exceedingly interesting sermon in the morning. The Sunday School was addressed by Revs. Hannon and Cornish, also Messrs Bowes, Brown and Dinsmore, of the school, and a very pleasant and instructive afternoon was spent. In the evening the church was well filled, and a platform meeting held. C. W. Rutledge was called to the chair; abstracts from the Missionary Report were read by the pastor, Rev. Geo. H. Cornish. after which Rev. Mr. Ayers of Flesherton gave a forcible address, which was followed by a soul stirring and captivating address by Rev. Mr. Hannon. He dwelt chiefly on the Indian Mission work, and was listened to with profound attention. The financial result of the meeting was over twenty five per cent above that of last year, which is indeed very encouraging. The Choir interspersed the speechies with choice selections of music.

PROHIBITION AND PEARUNA.—The anti-liquor question is a strong plank in the political platform, and one safe to lay hold of. All intoxicating beverage are safest when let alone, even as medicine. Burdock Blood Bitters is not a bar beverages, but a strictly pure medicine, reliable for diseases of the stomach liver, bowels, kidneys and blood, and will not aid in making drunkards.

Wanted a pair of License.

On Tuesday last a truly rural pair struck our town, whom we will call Susie Tompkins and David Smithers. He at once set out to procure a marriage license. His intended father-in-law accompanied them to town but he (David) thought he would trust himself alone in procuring the license. Upon enquiry he was directed to Mr. Brown's and he stated that he wanted a pair of license, but the boss was absent attending the nomination, and David was directed to Doc. Irwin's the Vet. who further directed him to McCulloughs Law-office, and on ascending the stairs he was ushered into the tailor shop where he was introduced to Prof, Corpulent who presented a commanding and pompous appearance and the following dialogue followed.

Prof.—Anything I can do for you?

David—Yes I want a pair of license:

Prof.—Going to keep a saloon?

David—O no, I want to get married

Prof.—It's a marriage license you want.

David—Yes.

Prof.—All right what's your name?

David—David Smithers.

Prof.—Your age?

David—32 years.

Prof.—Your occupation?

David—Laborer.

Prof.—Your residence?

David—Wherever I can find work.

Prof.—Your intended wife's name?

David—Susie Tompkins.

Prof.—Her age.

David—Well I coulden't say.

Prof.—But it is necessary to know would she be 25?

David—O no, not near that.

Prof.—Well say 22.

David—No not so much.

Prof.—Well, we'll have to say 22 or you will require to produce a certificate of her parents assent.

David O tha'r willin, and so is she.

Prof.—Well we'll say 22.

David—All right.

Prof.—Have you been married before?

David—Yes.

Prof,—Your wife is dead then I presme?

David—One of them is.

Prof.—You appear to have two wives.

David—Only one at a time.

Prof.—Well, what happened the other.

David—She left me.

Prof.—And is she still living?

David—Don't know.

Prof.—Did you seperate on good terms?

David—Not much.

Prof.—Then in this case it will be necessary that you give me a written declaration that you will love and support Susie.

The blank was filled and reluctantly signed.

David—Now boss, how much do you charge?

Prof.—Are you a grit or tory?

David—I'm for Blake every time.

Prof—All right, I won't charge you anything.

The valuable document was placed in a large envelope, sealed and delivered, and the applicant hastened to the parsonage saying there was a lot of friends waiting at home to receive them and had a keg of whiskey for the occasion. We have not learned what success he had with the parson.

"BONNIE MAGGIE;"

OR,

GRANDFATHER'S STORY.

BY NORA LAUGHER.

"About five and twenty years ago, Jack, business called me from Toronto on a particular visit to England.

After I had spent three weeks in one of the busiest parts of London, I began to think of a little relaxation and decided to see some of the grand, old English scenery before I returned home to Canada.

Accordingly, after visiting some of the most historical of the midland counties, I journeyed southward into Devonshire and stayed a a short time at Torquay, which I thought one of the prettiest places I had ever beheld.

Next I stayed awhile at a quaint little Cornish town, where the old fashioned dialect of the people seemed very strange and where nearly all the inhabitants' names began with Tre, Pol, or Pen.

I had not spent many days at Trewelly—the name of this queer little place—when I received a business letter summoning me to Liverpool. Accordingly I hastened thither at once, intending to remain there the next ten days when my vessel would sail for New York.

My business at Liverpool, however, was concluded much sooner than I had anticipated, and as I had another week before the Corinne set sail I determined to spend the remaining days in North Wales.

Consulting my guide book I found tha Llandudno is only a few hours' sail from Liverpool. Packing a few things in a small valise I hastily took the next boat there.

I think no place in the old country ever pleased me better than that small and peaceful Welsh sea-side town, so beautifully situated beneath the high rocky mountain known as the Great Orme's Head.

How often I thought of my two boys in their Canadian home, far away over the Atlantic, as I sat in Happy Valley—a quiet green nook of the Orme's Head—and gazed down upon the beach below at the groups of merry youngsters playing on the yellow sands.

One glorious morning after breakfast I started out for a long walk and toiled up a picturesque mountain called the Little Orme's Head. Up, up I went, through some lovely woodland scenery. Up and down more steep mountain sides, through more shady forests, where sometimes through the green branches of the trees I could first catch a glimpse of the wide, shining ocean.

Up and down, up and down hill I walked, pausing occasionally to gather some of the sweet wild purple heather or bracken-fern or to admire a lovely rugged view until I, at last, began to grow very, very weary and looking at my watch found that it was nearly four o'clock in the afternoon. In all probability I had walked eighteen or twenty miles.

I had just then climbed the highest mountain I had met with since leaving Llandudno and looking down to the valley below I beheld a romantic looking little fishing village.

Of course I hastened down the steep path for I was hungry and weary and longed for rest and refreshment. But in my hurry to make a final descent my foot slipped off the rock and I fell a distance of twenty feet, badly spraining my left ankle. The pain was so intense that for a few moments I lost all consciousness, then I became aware of a tiny pair of dimpled hands patting my face and head and a small, childish voice lisping, "I'se so 'fraid you'se hurt. Poor, poor big man! Shall Bonnie Maggie look if grandpap's come?"

"You are a good and brave, little girl," I said smiling, as with great difficulty I arose. "And so your name is Maggie. Maggie what, my dear? Will you tell me your other name?"

"Just Bonnie Maggie."

"But Bonnie Maggie what, dear?"

I questioned again, wondering what my two big boys at home would think of this charming little fairy could they but see her.

"I'se just Bonnie Maggie, and nussing else," persisted the little maid, archly shaking her flossy, golden curls and regarding me with big, brown, wondering eyes.

"I'se just Bonnie Maggie —— Oh, there's grandpap!" and the tiny, fairy-like figure—she could not have been more than five years old—went flying with fleet little bare feet across the wet sands, her curls dancing in the breeze, her pretty face destitute of its sheltering white sun hat, turning to look back every now and then to see if I remained where she left me.

"Grandpap—grandpap!" she called, gathering up her little frock and paddling through the wavelets to an aged and weather-beaten sailor seated in an old sea boat, whose name, painted in large, white letters on the stern, I could plainly read was the Bonnie Maggie.

"Grandpap, the big, big man has hurted his foot. Let us take him home wis us?" I heard her eagerly ask, as the old tar lifted her into the boat and kissed her tenderly.

After he had moored his boat he placed the child upon his broad shoulder, carrying her through the shallow water and across the sands to me.

"Gandpap is going to take you home, big man," she said, coming forward to stroke my beard, and then retreating to place her tiny hand in the old sailor's horny palm.

"Yes, sir! If you will accept the poor hospitality of a rough, old salt, who tried his best to serve his Queen and his country. This big scar on my cheek I got six years ago in the Crimean war, for I was then on board H.M.S. Sussex, and for which I now receive a pension from her Majesty. Proud of it, you ask? Ay, ay, sir, I am a'most as proud of it as of my Bonnie Maggie, here. God bless her."

As I grasped the hand and looked into the honest eyes of Isaac Winford, I knew that he, indeed, was making for that safe-port—I mean the Heavenly one. But, alas! I did not think his life's voyage was so near the end.

I must not stay now to tell you much about the neat, little, one-story, white-washed cottage, nor of the old man's great kindness to me the two nights I rested in the comfortable hammock-bed he provided for me.

I am now coming to the worst part of my story, Jack.

The third night of my stay in the little cottage, was, I think, the saddest I have ever experienced.

There had been a fearful thunderstorm that day, and towards evening the wind arose, blowing in great gusts, the heavy rain pouring down in torrents. The waves rose higher and higher, and came nearer and nearer, until I feared they would reach our windows.

Isaac had left home that morning in his boat, according to his usual custom. In fine weather he always took Bonnie Maggie with him; but when likely to be squally and rough, as to-day, he generally left her in charge of a friendly neighbor. I had, with her aid, prepared her a bowl of bread and milk; but which, however, I failed to make her eat. She sobbed pitifully for "Grandpa," as the night wore on. I strove to hide my uneasiness as to his non appearance by telling her funny stories of Canadian little girls and boys and by and bye she fell asleep in my arms.

Then I heard, amid the roaring of the wind and the waves, the heavy boom of a signal gun and I knew there was a vessel wrecked upon the coast.

Carrying Bonnie Maggie in my arms I limped to the casement, through which I could see a large crowd of fishermen and women hastening to the shore.

I longed to go to them and become one of the active workers; but dare not leave the little one entrusted to my care.

I could only wait through the long hours, with a strange feeling of sadness and pain at my heart.

Bonnie Maggie gave a joyful cry, "Grandpap is come!" when, at last, through the raging of the storm, we plainly heard the dull thud of men's heavy footsteps, and then the cottage door opened gently.

But, oh! what a sad sight met our eyes. The good old Isaac—not dead as I had at first supposed; but very badly injured with a blow from the mast of the ill-fated vessel—was lying upon a wooden shutter, supported by the village doctor and three brave sailors.

The latter took off their oil-skin caps and for a few moments knelt reverently down by the side of the bed whereon they had tenderly placed their wounded comrade.

After they, with the doctor, had left the cottage to hasten back to other sufferers of the wreck, Isaac gathered Bonnie Maggie to his heart and besought me, with tears rolling down his bronzed cheek that I would take care of her as of one of my own children. And as I grasped his hand and solemnly promised to bring her up as my own he replied, "Thank God! I knew you'd do it, sir. Now I can steer for Home in peace, for I feel that my little lamb will be safe from harm. God has been very good to me, sir," he added. "Sure it was He who sent you here. I have not much strength left, sir, but I must try and tell you that she is not my grandchild. I was never married and have neither kith nor kin. I saved her from the wreck of the Ariel five years ago, when she was a tiny baby—hers was the only life saved. It was my boat, the Bonnie Maggie, that rescued her and I named her after it, she knows no other, for there was no mark upon her clothes to identify her. Bring her up, as your own, sir.—I am growing weaker for—I am—steering—Home—God bless my Bonnie Maggie—" and the old man's voice grew fainter and fainter as he murmured over again, "I'm—steering—Home."

Surely no purer, truer soul ever steered Heavenward than that of Isaac Winford.

We buried him in the little graveyard, where I erected a white marble slab bearing his name and the date of his brave death.

Bonnie Maggie and I then sailed from Liverpool to Toronto, where Grandmama welcomed her as a sweet little daughter to play with her two big sons.

And by-and-by, when Bonnie Maggie grew a big girl, Grandmama and I, although we could hardly bear to part with her, for she was the sunshine of our home, decided to send her to a good school at Montreal for a few years.

She returned to us a beautiful young lady, and as good and true as she was beautiful. Just the old, winsome, Bonnie Maggie, only older and more thoughtful.

And like your fairy tales end, my lad, there came a handsome young prince to win our Bonnie Maggie's heart. But the young prince was no other than my eldest son, Cyril—your father, Jack,——for your dear mother, my boy, is the Bonnie Maggie.

How to Kill Murderers.

"How shall the death penalty be inflicted?" was the title of the subject discussed recently by the Society of Medical Jurisprudence, N. Y. Dr. N. E. Brill read the letter he had received from the Committee on Capital Punishment appointed by the State Legislature, asking his views on that subject. Dr. Brill, in reply, declared that he considered hanging barbarous, and quoted Dr. Hardy, who had attended various hangings, and had never seen death occur by a broken neck in a single instance. "The most humane method," he said, "is that of the guillotine. I am opposed to electricity, because dynamos are too expensive; to prussic acid, because its action is indefinite, and often produces violent convulsions; to the garrotte, because it frequently fails." "I'd have a man taken to a dark cave, and there bury him after hanging," said Lawyer D. S. Riddle, springing to his feet so suddenly that every one looked surprised. "Let no human being know where he is buried. Surround the crime with all the horrors you can. With respect to humanitarianism—to kindness to this brute—I say away with it; hang the man—hang him over and over if the rope breaks—hang him, hang him, hang him." At each repetition of the imperative Mr. Riddle's voice grew louder. "Don't have any reporters around. Don't let the man be elevated to the rank of a hero. Ladies bring him roses and reporters speak of his fine looks and personal appearance. I think that by no means we ought to abolish hanging. It is a good old common law practice, and by all means hang to it." [Laughter.] Dr. Peters advocated the garrotte.

Dr. Woods didn't look upon hanging as brutal. If a man committed a crime he thought he should have a punishment that would be a deterrent to others. Dr. McLaurie suggested taking the criminal to a dark room and drowning him in carbolic acid gas. Lawyer W. H. Russell advocated delivering the criminal over to a commission of selected scientists and letting them take his life in the interests of science.

Jupson—"That is a fine painting you've got there, Smith." Smith—"Well, I flatter myself that it is you know." Jupson—"Is it one of the old masters, do you think?" Smith—"Well, I ain't exactly sure, but I am going to have the opinion of a friend on that point to day. Jupson—"Indeed! A connoisseur?" Smith—"I should say so! Why, man, he's been in the tea business six years and handled thousands of pictures."

The Queen's "Drawing-Room."

A "drawing-room," as Queen Victoria's reception to ladies is called, begins at 3 o'clock in the afternoon. But—more particularly of late years—the queen has not always been able to remain throughout the ceremony. Perhaps, after an hour's sufferance on her part, her majesty retires and the princess of Wales fills her place. But the princess is not the rose. She only lives near it, and the triumph of the day is darkened for those ladies who, arriving a little late, courtesy to the princess instead of the queen. Accordingly, it seems to have occurred to some enterprising lady that if she had her carriage at the gates of the palace an hour before they were thrown back she would be in pretty good time. At the next drawing-room someone bettered this, being there an hour and five minutes early. The process has gone forward till now the clanging of noon from the clock-tower of Westminster is heard adown a long string of carriages containing ladies in lowest evening dress, sitting stonily waiting while a mob of sight-seers peer at them as mercilessly as if they were framed pictures of their ancestresses.

There is a well-authenticated record of a young lady who had carefully and successfully rehearsed her courtesy to the queen, and who, suddenly finding herself in the royal presence, and seeing to the right an open door, forgot everything but the comfort of being away, and without noticing the queen, princess, or prince, skipped toward the door and so out into the space. The great rock on which debutantes split is making their courtesy too soon. Their mind is full of it. It has lived with them for days and nights, and there is a great human impulse to get rid of it as soon as possible. Debutantes who have presence of mind, and habitues of court, know that the proper thing to do is to walk close up to the queen, and then perform the outrageous flop which has come to take the place of the pretty maidenly courtesy. After this the debutante finds herself in a passage between two groups. On her right hand is the diplomatic circle, with many of her majesty's ministers. The prime minister rarely fails to stand by through the long hours of the drawing-room. On the other side, grouped to the left of the queen, are her many sons and daughters. It is necessary, or at least desirable, that to each several one as she passes, the debutante should make obeisance.

VARIETIES.

A curious habit of deer is that of eating bones. If a dead deer is left on a hill, when birds and insects have eaten its flesh, its bones will often be consumed by its own relations. Deer will also eat horns that have been shed.

Of all ordinary buildings that are not specially constructed for earthquake resistance, those which have the thickest walls and are constructed of the biggest blocks of stone have proved, it is said, to be the most capable of surviving very severe shocks.

There are now about one hundred and twenty thousand acres of land planted with tea in the island of Ceylon, and it has been demonstrated that the country is capable of producing a greater yield of leaf per acre than any other country in the world, and that its tea can command higher prices than any other tea in the market.

Ashoure, a kind of porridge made of new wheat, almonds, and sugar cooked in water, is on certain feast-days among the Mussulmans distributed to the poor. In the higher classes presents of ashoure are exchanged in beautiful china or porcelain vases decorated with ribbons, and enveloped in coloured gauze. At the Sultan's palace in Constantinople it is prepared for all members of the imperial family and his majesty's ministers.

A common disfigurement of cemeteries in France is the wreath of black or black and white beads. There is hardly a tomb, unless it be in the fosse commune or among those that are quite forgotten by the living, without some of these bead trappings, the creaking and rattling of which when the wind is strong is one of the most dismal sounds conceivable. To hear this noise coming from a cemetery at night is enough to make the blood of these who are not used to it turn a little cold.

The best examples of the eagre or bore, the phenomenon in which the tide moves all at once, are said to be furnished by the mouths of the rivers Amazon, Hooghly, and Tsien-tang. In the case of the last mentioned river, in China, the wave plunges on like an advancing cataract four or five miles in breadth and thirty feet high, and thus passes up the stream to a distance of eighty miles at the rate of twenty-five miles an hour. The change from ebb to flow-tide is almost instantaneous. In the Amazon the whole tide passes up the stream in five or six waves following each other in rapid succession, and each from twelve to fifteen feet high.

MOTHER-LOVE!

BY JOHN IMRIE, TORONTO.

See yonder mother with her sickly child
  Pressed closely to her heaving, anxious breast,
For many days and nights forebodings wild
  Have fill'd her heart and banished needful rest;
Yet at the faintest cry or wish exprest
  She gladly seeks to soothe its every pain,
And, if successful, thinks it purest gain
Ere to her own great need comes fitful rest!
Oh! mother-love! great waters cannot quench,
  Nor flames deter thee from thy holy zeal;
Thy love-strong hands grim prison-bars would wrench,
  There with thy suffering child "at home" to feel;
The purest love on earth is mother-love,
  Full kin to that made manifest above!

No man is ever likely to accomplish any more than he resolutely sets himself to accomplish.

"Mr. Readycash," gratefully said Charles Hardup to his wife's paternal progenitor, as he presented him for the dozenth time with lucre to pay a year's rent of his dwelling-house, "instead of a pa-in-law, you have ever seemed like an own father to me." "Yes," dryly rejoined the old man, "I certainly have always acted in a 'pay-rental' manner since you married my daughter."

MERRY MOMENTS.

Bees may be said to be paradoxical in that they are stingy, yet not parsimonious.

When a girl gets in a husband a better man than she expected him to be he is a air prize to her!

Liberty is always pictured as a woman because liberty to survive must be vigilant, and there is no blind side to a woman.

Mike—"Phat are yez workin' at now, Pat?" Pat—"Diggin' in the sewer." Mike—"Phat do yez get fer it?" Pat—"One dollar a day and the rheumatiz, begorra!"

Patient—"Why do you watch the thermometer on the wall so closely?" Nurse—"Because the doctor said if the temperature riz I should give you the quinine."

It is admitted, far and wide,
  That it has been the maiden aim,
Since first this world of ours began,
  To change the maiden name.

Courting a girl is like starting a newspaper. It starts out as a weekly, then it becomes a tri-weekly, then merges into a daily. If it has any enterprise it comes out with an extra occasionally.

An elderly Boston man, who was induced to try the toboggan slide and is laid up with a broken leg in consequence, wrote to Sam Jones the other day: "Go for tobog in your next sermon. It's just awful!"

Mrs. Spriggins thinks that a certain young lady of her acquaintance has no sense of "proprietorship" because when the funeral was passing she had her sleigh driven right through the centre of the "corsage."

A sailor being asked how he liked his bride is reported to have remarked: "Why, d'ye see, I took her to be only half of me, as the parson says, but dash my buttons if she isn't twice as much as I; for I'm only a tar and she's a tar-tar."

"What's the price of sausages?" "Ten cents a pound." "You asked fifteen cents this morning." "Yea: dot vos ven I had some. Now I ain't got none I sells for ten cents. Dot makes me a rebutation for selling sheap, and I don't lose noddings."

Pittsburg Tramp—"If you'll fill me up with a good dinner I'll saw some wood. I'm willin' to work." Woman (shortly)—"You know very well we burn nothing but natural gas." Tramp—"Well, gimme suthin' to eat, an' I'll turn on the gas for you."

"I tell yer, my frien's," said Brother Gardner, "when I come to realize jist what a queer piece ob clay we am, an' how much workin' ober we need to come out perfeck, I can't wonder ober de shoutin' an' hurrahin' in heaben when one ob us grown folks finds his way in."

"You have heard all the evidence," said a justice of the peace in summing up; "you have also heard what the learned counsel have said. If you believe what the counsel for the plaintiff has told you, your verdict will be for the plaintiff; but if, on the other hand, you believe what the defendant's counsel has told you, then you will give a verdict for the defendant. But if you are like me, and don't believe what either of them have said, then I'll be hanged if I know what you will do."

The Coming Man.

What will he be? Will he be unlike you and me? He will probably be a good deal like his father and have inherited forces impelling him. His brain and heart will not materially change places or functions. He will hate and love, and have aspiration and faith like ordinary creatures. He will probably begin in profound ignorance like the rest of us, and when he is seventy years old he will learn that he has not learned all that there is to be learned. He may learn that life is without end. Looking down the vista of coming years, he may observe a modified religion, with idols greatly simplified, and with a more mild temper to know his Creator; but science is purging the concrete, and altars with the offerings of peace and good will to men are slowly being reared.

Youthful ambition is beautiful and should be encouraged at the same time it should be guided. Civilization is not perfect, and it has many sores. If we do not feel religion, it is no evidence that it does not exist. Religion is a system of principles, as much as morals, and its shams and follies are no argument against the genuine article. An outgrown religion exists only with such as desire it. Altars have beautiful offerings, but these may not always be in accord with the noblest part of man.

To be unlike anybody else is a laudable enough ambition, but ambition must not be allowed to run away with reason. If Herod beheaded John, we must not behead the idea of moral responsibility. The modern prophet must correctly interpret natural desires. The losing side should have a generous hearing. Slow old men and fast young men must continue to observe the good old ways of trust and soberness. Sound morality must become the universal practice. The Sabbath is a natural day of rest and should be used wisely. Nature will be studied more and more. Reckless pleasure will decrease. Experience teaches a dear school, but the cost of the past is not more than it is worth. A good time is coming and a tender and beautiful knowledge will guide us. To stand beneath the arch of eternal years and ask an all-wise Providence to relieve us of all responsibility would not be wise. With sufficiently increased knowledge the coming man will be able to properly take care of himself, and do his whole duty, and this is happiness.

Admiration Without Limit.

No true man likes to have "admiration without limit" roaring and gushing and twittering round him all the day long. A great man does not disdain praise, but he disdains the notion of being dependent on it. When Doctor Keate was head-master of Eton, he was called in to suppress a rebellion among the boys. He executed justice so promptly and so fearlessly that when he took his departure even the rebels began to cheer. He turned on them with a grim smile. "None of that, boys! If you may cheer me, you may hiss me. There was a true heroic dignity in his remark.

SCIENTIFIC AND USEFUL.

The irritability that overtakes women so frequently may sometimes, says the Lancet, be clearly traced to an excessive indulgence in afternoon tea.

The use of peroxide of hydrogen is extending for bleaching purposes. It is now employed for the bleaching of feathers and also of tussah silks, for which it is admirably adapted.

It is asserted that the leaves of an Indian plant, the Mschlia niligerica, have been found to possess marked antipyretic properties, a decoction of the plant acting in this respect more powerfully than cinchona. A peculiarly bitter principle is also said to have been extracted from the leaves.

The soundness of timber may be ascertained by placing the ear close to one end while another person delivers a succession of smart blows with a hammer or mallet upon the opposite end, when a continuance of the vibrations will indicate to an experienced ear even the degree of soundness. If only a dull thud meets the ear, the listener may be certain that unsoundness exists.

Frost-proof ink: Aniline black, one drachm; rub with a mixture of concentrated hydrochloric acid one drachm and pure alcohol ten ounces. The deep blue solution obtained is diluted with a hot solution of concentrated glycerine one and a half drachm in four ounces of water. This ink does not injure steel pens, is unaffected by concentrated mineral acids or strong alkalies, and will not freeze at a temperature of from twenty-two to twenty-four degrees below zero.

The Lunatic.

During one of his visits to Paris, Baron von Humboldt expressed to his friend Dr. Blanche, the distinguished authority in matters concerning insanity, a desire to meet one of his patients. "Nothing easier," said Dr. Blanche; "come and take dinner with me to-morrow." The next day Humboldt found himself seated at the dinner-table of the famous alienist in company with two unknown guests. One of them, who was dressed in black, with white cravat, gold-rimmed spectacles, and who had a smooth face and very bald head, sat with great gravity through the entire dinner. He was evidently a gentleman of undoubted manners, but very taciturn. He bowed ate, and said not a word. The other guest, on the contrary, wore a great shock of hair brushed wildly into the air; his shabby blue coat was buttoned askew, his collar was rumpled, and the ends of his cravat floated over his shoulders. He helped himself, ate, and chatted at the same time. Story after story did this incoherent person pile up. He mixed the past with the present, flew from Swedenbrog to Fourier, from Cleopatra to Jenny Lind, from Archimedes to Lamartine, and talked politics and literature in the same breath. At the dessert Humboldt leaned over and whisperd in his host's ear, glancing at the same time at the fantastic personage, whose discourse was still runing on, "I am very much obliged to you. Your maniac has greatly amused me." "My maniac?" said the doctor, starting back. Why that isn't the lunatic! It's the other one." "What—the one who hasn't said a word?" "Certainly." "But who in the world can the man be who has talked in this fashon all the while?" asked the Baron. "That is Balzac, the famous novelist."

How Strong the French Army Is.

If General Boulanger has his way ten new cavalry regiments will be created, not for offensive purposes, as the authorities are anxious to assure us, but for the simple reason that the Germans are numerically stronger in this arm than the French. On the other hand, the artillery will be left in statu quo. It is considered that this branch of the service needs no improvement nor addition, and we are told that it is superior in every way to the German artillesy. Certainly, the artillery is the favorite arm in France. The regular army is composed of 19 corps, including the one in Algeria. In time of war these 19 corps could be raised to 28, without infringing on what are called the second and third lines, to wit, the territorial army, which comprises 145 regiments of infantry, 13 regiments of artillery, 144 squadrons of cavalry and the reserves of the regular and territorial armies. Each of these 28 corps would consist of about 38,000 men. But General Boulanger contemplates reducing them in war time to 22. These 22 army corps would contain 5 infantry brigades instead of 4, and would each number 44,000 men. Thus the first line would comprise nearly 1,000,000 regular troops, the second line or territorial army an equal number of men, and it is estimated that in a fortnight after the declaration of war these 2,000,000 would be mobilized and available for any operations.

Canada and the States.

Hon. S. A. Richie, of Akron, Ohio, has delivered an address, in which he points out the advantages to the United States of commercial relations with Canada. Mr. Richie says Canada imported $50,000,000 worth of American goods in 1885, whereas all South and Central American countries put together only took $64,000,000 worth of such goods in the same time. In other words, forty-five millions of people to the south of the United States only took twenty per cent. more American goods than the four million to the north. This should open the eyes of Senator Ingalls and the statesmen of his stamp who talk so fiercely of killing Canada by cutting of commercial relations with us. Mr. Richie, in his address, touches further upon the condition of the Dominion. He declares that our imports and exports, per head of the population, are greater than those of the United States; that our railway mileage is, per head of the population, the same as that of the United States, and that our growth in population since 1776 has been relatively the same as that of the United States. The Republic commenced with a population of three millions, and it now has fifty millions. Canada at the time had a population of 300,000 and we now have a population of five millions.

Some years ago the Parisians were in the habit of giving their dogs short and pretty names, of which the French language has many; now, owing to the Anglomania which prevails in certain quarters of Paris, dogs are christened with such names as "Tam o' Shanter;" "Rose of Canterbury," "Witt o' the Witt," "Lord Brolingbrookingham," et-cetera.

RIFT AND SPRAY,

OR,

LOVE AND VENGEANCE AMONG THE SMUGGLERS.

THE MOST FASCINATING OCEAN ROMANCE SINCE THE DAYS OF COOPER AND MARYATT.

CHAPTER XXVII.

THE ESCAPE OF MOCQUET AND MARIE FROM THE RIFT.

The night was far advanced when, on the little plateau of the cliff which formed the "look-out" of old Joseph, there assembled Martin, Joseph, Gerald and Grace.

Their object was to rescue from the cabin of the Rift Captain Mocquet and his daughter, Marie.

Nothing but the superstitious fears of Dolan had prevented him going, long before that, into his cabin, in which case it would have been next to impossible but that the French captain's daughter would have been discovered.

If no danger to Marie arose from that discovery, beyond the terror of being in the power of such a man, there can be no doubt but that Dolan would have looked upon her as another prisoner, whose ransom would have been a long and a strong pull at Captain Mocquet's purse.

And now, in the silence of the night—a silence only broken by the sullen wash of the sea against the cliffs and the faint whistle of the wind as it moaned far away on the face of the deep—those four persons met and in whispers conversed together as to the best mode of providing for the rescue of the captives.

"You, Martin," said Gerald—"you say what is to be done and I am sure we will all obey you."

"Why, look you here, Master Gerald," said Martin. "One thing is clear enough to see, and that is—that if Dolan has his way, you will be worse off than the Frenchman."

"Indeed?"

"Yes, Gerald. He intends to betray the whole lot of us. And what did he take you on the last cruise for, but to mix you up in the affair?"

"It must be so!"

"Oh, my poor Gerald," said Grace.

"Come now, miss," said Joseph. "don't you be a taking on about it. We will see you both out of this place. And I'm not sorry to leave it, too."

"I have been thinking about that," said Martin.

"About what?"

"Leaving the place."

"Well, but you don't mean to say that you will stay, Martin, and let Dolan have all his own way?"

"No, but there's some among the crew that I don't want to come to the bad, and if so be as Dolan means that they should fall into the hands of the Philistines, I should like to balk him, and my idea is just this; Let us get the Frenchman and his baby out of the Rift, and send them off with Gerald, here, and Miss Grace, and then let us speak to the crew."

"And tell them all?"

"Ay! Tell them all. Let us come back and lay hold of Dolan and make him give up the money that he says he has hidden hereaway, in chests, in the crevices of the upper cave, and let us all disperse this very night. Before daylight we may be, most of us, far enough away from here."

"That will do."

"Then it's agreed, Joseph?"

"Quite so."

"Now then, for the Rift It's Benjamin who is on watch on the deck and I don't seem to care whether he is knocked on the head or not, for a greater ruffian never stepped. Do you know, Joseph, I cannot get out of my head the cries of that man who was drowned in the sea-cave."

"Suffles?"

"Yes. It was a fearful thing. Come on, now. My plan is, just to go on board and get Benjamin out of the way by fair means or foul and then row out into the bay with the Frenchman and his baby and get to the cutting in the cliff."

"You will call Marie Mocquet a baby," said Gerald.

"Lord bless you, yes, I forgot you said as it wasn't a baby. Well, it's no odds, is it? All's right; and now, come on."

"Martin led the way and with noiseless steps the little party took their route toward that narrow opening in the cliff, with its rude stairs, that led down to the sea cave, and at which Grace had first made her appearance on the occasion of the return of the Rift.

Not the slightest sound disturbed the repose of the sea-cave, but those natural ones which might be expected from the restless contact of the water with the sides of the cavern and the boats, and the cutter.

Those sounds consisted of a washing, lapping kind of motion and perhaps mingling now and then, with them was the slight movement of the high and heavy sails that closed up the second entrance to the cavern as the night wind pressed at times heavily against them from without.

A single lantern was at the bow of the Rift and it shed a faint, rippling kind of light on the water.

"Hush!" said Martin. "Do you hear the deck watch, any of you?"

"No," was the whispered reply from all.

"Then he is gone to sleep."

"That's more than likely," said Joseph, "and if so, you know, Martin, you wouldn't kill him?"

"No. I don't wan't to kill him I'll speak to him first, and tell him to be quiet He is a bad one, but I don't want to kill him. Now, come on."

Martin descended the steps—at the foot of them he had taken the precaution to move one of the boats of the Rift, and into that quietly and slowly they glided.

"Where is Dolan, now?" whispered Gerald.

"In his own caboose, in the upper tavern, I take it," said Martin. "He's fast asleep, you may depend. Hush!"

"What is it?"

"Lord preserve us! What is that?"

A huge, sucking, half-choking noise came upon their ears, as if some huge fish was lapping the edge of the water. They all listened attentively, and the sound ceased.

"I don't half like that," said Joseph.

"Hush! There it is again. It is thereaway, in that dark corner."

"Pull to it," said Gerald.

"Nay! nay!"

"Why, it can't be anything that can hurt us, Martin. It is very much better to see what it is at once. Besides, we are on a good errand now, you know."

"Pull away, then."

It was with evident reluctance that Martin slowly pulled with Gerald toward the deep and shadowy portion of the sea-cave from where the odd sounds came, but he was ashamed not to keep stroke with Gerald, so the boat soon reached within about twelve feet of the cavern wall, and then they plainly saw a something close to the wall.

"Lord be good to us," said Martin. "It's got eyes."

"A seal!" said Joseph.

"Oh, no," replied Gerald, as he gave one more stroke with the oar and brought the boat close to the object. There, even by the very faint light that was there, they saw face and head of some human being and two arms holding by a ring bolt that was set into the cliff, there being many such all round the cavern.

The eyes glared at the boat and its occupants and the lips seemed to move, but no sound issued from them.

"Good heavens!" said Joseph, "it's Mr. Suffles."

Then a thin, weak voice, said:

"Suffles!" and the hands shook the ring-bolt.

"He lives!" said Gerald.

"Poor wretch!" said Martain. "He lives indeed; but how he got here, I can't make out. I'll get him into the boat. Come, Mr. Suffles, no harm is meant you, and if you keep quiet you may get away in safety, for I don't take upon myself to say that it was you who brought the Philistines down on us, when we were receiving the cargo."

Mr. Suffles evidently heard these words, but was by far too chilled and too terrified to reply to them, nor did he make the least motion to get into the boat.

Then Martin took a vigorous hold of him on one side of his coat collar and Joseph on the other.

"Come, let go the ringbolt and we will cant you into the boat in a moment."

Mr. Suffles made no reply, but only glared in the face of Martin, with a look of pitiable distress.

"Let go."

"He won't," said Joseph.

"Come—come. We won't harm you."

Then in a faint whisper—a whisper hoarse and strange, Mr. Suffles spoke:

"I cannot—I cannot. They won't move."

"What won't?"

"Fingers—fingers!"

Martin laid his hands on the fingers of Mr. Suffles, which clasped the ringbolt. They had lost the power of motion, but stiffening there in their nervous clutch still held on to the cold iron It was with difficulty that Martin, finger by finger, aided them, so to speak, from the ringbolt, and then they lifted the wretched man into the boat.

A shudder passed from head to foot of Mr. Suffles.

"Don't," he said faintly.

"Don't what?"

"Kill me; I shall soon go."

"Be comforted," said Grace in her soft, gentle voice. "Be comforted; no one will harm you now. Take heart and be comforted!"

Mr. Suffles did not reply, but they heard him sobbing.

"Hush," said Gerald. "You will do us harm and bring us into danger if you are not still."

He was still in a moment and then he said faintly:

"I did not bring the Philistihes."

"That's right," said Martin. "Then I'll look after you, though how you got clear of the chain links I don't know."

"Cut—cut them—off," gasped Suffles.

"Oh! you go and tell that to the marines; sailors won't believe it. Hush not another word, now."

The boat was close to the side of the Rift, and then Gerald whispered:

"Rest oars here. I think I can speak to Captain Mocquet, through the port, here, if I stand on the thwarts of the boat."

"Ay, ay! so you can."

Martin and Joseph kept the boat close to the side of the Rift, and Gerald stood up, and looked into the cabin, through the little port, which he had passed through on two occasions—once to rescue Marie, and once to rejoin Grace in the cave.

All was dark in the cabin.

"Captain Mocquet!" whispered Gerald.

"Captain Mocquet!"

"Mon Dieu!"

"It is I, sir. Captain Mocquet, it is I, Gerald!"

"Ah? c'est le bon Gerald," said Marie.

"Hush! hush!"

"Hoy!" roared a voice from the deck of the Rift. "Hoy! what's all that by the lee-bow, eh?"

"All right," replied Martin, as he scrambled on board. "A message from the captain to you, Benjamin; and in the first place, he says that if there's any noise he will blow your brains out."

"Oh! indeed?"

"Yes. He wants the Frenchman.

"Captain Mocquet?"

"Yes."

"Then he shan't go."

"Why, what do you mean, you lubber?"

"Why, just this, Martin, that he shan't go, that's all. Not unless Dolan comes for him himself, I tell you."

"Well, but it's a very odd, thing, Benjamin, that Captain Dolan has been obliged to send for Mocquet."

"Obliged?"

"Yes."

"How obliged? What do you mean by that?"

"Why, you know, Benjamin, it was you that tied the chain-links so tightly about Suffles."

"Hold—what if I did? Hold you, now, I say. A fellow don't want to be put in mind of little disagreeables in the middle of the night."

"No, but I was going to tell you. Captain Dolan was fast asleep, it appears, when somebody shook him, and when he opened his eyes, who should he see but Suffles."

"Avast!"

"Yes, Suffles. Dead, of course, and all damp and cold, and says he: Dolan, says he, send for Captain Mocquet, says he, out of the cabin of the Rift, because, says he, I want to go there and say something to Mocquet's daughter's ghost, who is there, says he, and then heave down with a rope and haul of Captain Dolan, and then I'll come up, says he."

"Great Shades!"

"And so we have come for Mocquet."

"Very good. Now I tell you what, Martin, if you think I'm such a chuse-going, know-nothing idiot as to believe that cock-and-a-bull story, you don't know your man; and I shall give an alarm."

"Don't. If you do, Suffles's ghost may come here and look over the taffrails, and say, Benjamin! Benjamin! Benjamin!"

"Benjamin!" said a faint, hollow voice, at this moment, and over the larboard bow of the cutter, there, just appeared the pale face of Suffles, with the hair all matted with salt water and a long piece of sea-weed trailing over one eye.

Benjamin made but one summersault right over the star-board bulwarks and fell plump into the sea

CHAPTER XXVIII.—FALLEN INTO THE CLUTCHES OF THE FOE.

"Good-by," said Martin.

"Where's he gone?" asked Joseph.

"To the old un's locker, I fancy. I don't see him. How are you Mr. Suffles? Better?"

"Lord bless you, no, Martin, me and Gerald is a holding of him up. He's dreadful limp-getting, but he ain't quite unsensible, cos you see he knew you wanted him to say Benjamin and he said it."

They laid Mr. Suffles carefully down in the boat again, and then Gerald scrambled into the cabin by the port.

"Come, Captain Mocquet," he said. "Come, Marie—you will be saved, I think, now."

Mocquet embraced Gerald, and then Marie twined her arms around one of his, and began her song of "Gerald-Marie! Marie-Gerald!"

"Hush! Oh! hush," said Gerald. "We are in danger. A word may bring destruction on us all."

Mocquet spoke to Marie, and she was silent on the moment, only she clung the closer to Gerald. Martin closed the hatchway and called down to them:

"Up—up at once, and let us be off. I fancied I heard something just now."

"Come, oh, come, said Gerald. "Quick, Captaid Mocquet."

"Oui! Oui! I have got him!"

"Who!"

"One—two pistol."

"Oh, yes! That is right, Come now.

Another moment and they were on the deck of the Rift and then, by the faint reflection of the lantern at the bows of the ship they could just all see each other like so many phantoms. Marie still clung to Gerald and would hardly leave him to let her father help her over into the boat. Then for the first time she saw Grace.

The French girl uttered an exclamation of surprise and held her face toward Grace who, in her gentle, quiet way, kissed her and then shook hands with her.

"Eh bien," said Marie "et cet ami Gerald, ou est-it?"

Gerald dropped into the boat. He was the last to leave the Rift, and then he said:

"Ready!"

Joseph and Martin took an oar each. Captain Mocquet put his right arm around Marie and spoke to her rapidly, in tones of great emotion. The boat was slowly and quietly pulled toward the mouth of the cavern.

"Hold!" said Gerald.

"They ceased rowing.

"Do you hear?"

"Eyes and limbs!" said Martin. "I hear the dip of oars."

"So do I," said Joseph.

"And coming this way, too. Look—look!"

There was a crackling noise, and, then the faint flash of a light was visible for a moment. It was in the hands of a man in a boat. They saw the face. It was that of Dolan, and in the boat was a square chest, which appeared to sink its after part into the water.

"Dolan!" whispered Joseph.

"Dolan!" said Martin.

"He escapes with the treasure chest," said Joseph,

"The villain!"

With the lantern placed upon the chest in front of him in the boat—a small lantern that he had lit—Dolan rowed slowly and steadily toward the cutter. The boat in which was embarked the fortunes of those in whom we are interested, slowly, by a light touch on the surface of the water from the oars, was edged off into the deep shadow close to the side of the cavern.

They all kept their eyes fixed upon the face of Dolan, strange and almost spectral as it looked, by the dim light of the little lantern in front of him, the only ray of which seemed to fall upon him.

What he could want at the Rift was beyond their conjectures, but they saw him make way right to the side of the cutter, and then, in the deep stillness of the night, they heard him whisper:

"Benjamin! Benjamin! Hoy! Hi, there! It is time!"

All was still, as well it might be, on board the Rift, and then Dolan spoke again:

"It is time, I say. Come now; I am ready. Come and help me, as we agreed."

"Ah," whispered Martin, "I see now. Benjamin was to help him to escape. Keep close."

They kept their boat quite close to the side of the cliff, but had they remained out in the open water of the sea cave, it is very doubtful if Dolan would have seen them, as the little kind of halo of light that his lantern sent about left all beyond that limited circle in the most profound darkness.

(TO BE CONTINUED).

Every one has a fair turn to be as great as he pleases.

The handmaid of Scripture was a simple thing compared with the tailor-made girl of the present day.

Epernay, Marne, is a vast subterranean "city of champagne." For miles and miles there are streets hewn out of solid chalk, flanked with bottles of champagne of all blends and qualities. There is no light in this labyrinth of streets, crossings, and turnings except what the spluttering candles afford. All is dark, dank, and damp, with the temperature away down about zero. The largest champagne manufacturers in Epernay have underground cellars which cover forty-five acres and contain five million bottles of wine. There is a whole street in Epernay lined with fine chateaux, the proprietors of which possess similar establishments. The whole town is honeycombed with these underground galleries for the manufacture and storage of champagne.

Miss Kate Fortune, the lady who was the occupant of the stage coach that upset a distance of 400 feet down [illegible] Pass, Colorado, without sustaining as much as a scratch has arrived east. Mrs. Townsley is prepossessing and about twenty-five years old. Describing the marvellous accident, the details of which have not before been printed, she says: "At daybreak on that morning I was awakened at my hotel in Leadville and informed that the Aspen stage coach was waiting for me. It was bitter cold and was snowing so densely that the driver had to pilot me to the coach. I had on a heavy double fold velvet dress, a sealskin sacque, a buffalo robe pinned over my shoulders, my head covered by a fur cap, and my face enveloped in a shawl, allowing an aperture for my eyes. Despite all these protections I

WAS FRIGHTFULLY COLD.

The coach was drawn by six horses, and was on wheels. We were preceded by the Granite coach, which was on runners. The road over Elk Mountain is a natural one that will admit of but a single coach passing. At the apex of the mountain the Granite coach halted in a station blasted out of the rock, and allowed us to go ahead. Here the descent began. The road at this point runs at an incline of 45°. The driver put on his lock-chain to the wheels, thus virtually converting them into runners. The vehicle, despite these precautions and by its own weight, went down at a frightful pace. We could barely keep our seats. We balanced ourselves as best we could. Running up from the track and through the box of the coach was a perpendicular bar of steel called the kingpin. I clung to this and managed to keep myself right side up. Down the narrow path in the side of the mountain we went, with

THE HORSES IN A MAD GALLOP

to keep the coach from running them down. We were rounding Independence Pass when suddenly the driver cried, "Jump, jump, for your——.' He never finished the sentence. He had been holding the coach as near the embankment as the narrow pass could permit. Ahead of him he saw a heavy boulder topple and fall down the mountain side and into the path. This caused him to make the cry of warning. The obstruction was but twenty yards ahead of him, and it was beyond human power to stay the impetus the coach had gotten coming down the incline. I saw the driver leap. Inside we held on to the kingpin. Down we went, and in another instant the forward wheels struck the rock. The hind part of the coach was thrown forward and outward and the kingpin snapped assunder like a reed. The box with all in it went over the precipice on its side and through the window I fell out. Less fortunate than myself, the coach and my fellow-tourists lodged in a crevice on the side of the precipice, some 180 feet below the road. I was thrown out with such force that I cleared this crag and kept on and to the bed of the canon and into a bank of snow, cutting my way into it as if it was water, head first. The Granito coach just to the rear of us pulled into a notch in the rocks and the driver and prospectors got out and climbed down to where I had lodged. Armed with shovels, they began to dig me out, and it is curious to relate the one flesh wound I received was from the blade of a shovel which ploughed a furrow in my ankle when they reached me. I was finally dug out, unconscious and to all appearances dead. Restoratives were administered, and I was taken up and carried to the toll house at the head of the cliff. Here my hands and limbs were rubbed and my face slapped until my cheeks were raw. But all to no avail, I was black in the face, and there was no audible or visible respiration. I was left in the care of the toll-keeper and the Granite coach passengers, while the two drivers started for Aspen, thirteen miles distant, to summon surgical aid. One of the party returned at midnight with doctors. In the meantime I had revived and had, in company with the toll-keeper, gone down in a sleigh to the dinner station, three miles below, and was administering to the wounded and dying. All the rest had sustained frightful injuries in their fall of 180 feet."

DOWN THE FULL 400 FEET

FRANCE AND GERMANY.

A New Railroad Tunnel Under the Alps to be Located for its Strategic Value.

Some time ago there was published a detailed description of a scheme for piercing the Simplon, and thereby fo ming a new and direct railway route from Paris to Milan. That this prediction would in all probability have been fulfilled there is every reason to believe had it not been for rival schemes, each of which found a considerable number of supporters. Of these schemes the ones which attracted most notice, after the Simplon, were the Mount Blanc and Great St. Bernard routes.

The Mont Blanc tunnel scheme has dropped out of sight, for the time at least, but the St. Bernard and the Simplon still hold their ground. In fact, up to a short time ago, the Simplon might be said to have had the running all to itself, and a syndicate of financiers was actually formed to raise the necessary capital. Since then the St. Bernard idea has been persistently forced upon public attention by its promoters, and opinion as to the respective merits of each scheme may be said to be pretty equally balanced, though if anything inclining to the Simplon.

Upon France, and France alone, depends the decision as to which of the two projected tunnels shall be made. If it were a mere question of commercial utility and probable remunerative returns the St. Bernard could not hold a candle to the Simplon; but the real question is which route would be most useful to France in case of a great European war in which France might find Italy arrayed against her? This will be better understood by those who know how extremely jealous France is of the St. Gothard, this jealousy arising from the fact, or the supposition, that from a strategical point of view the St. Gothard gives more advantages to Germany than to France. Whether this be true or not, it is beyond dispute that the route of the new Alpine tunnel will be determined in Paris, for from France must come the subsidy requisite for the promoters to give practical effect to their scheme. By this Simplon route there would be a saving of 305 kilometres between Paris and Brindisi as compared with the St. Gothard, and as this may be said to represent nearly three hours in time, it is a strong point in favor

EDITORIAL NOTES.

—The Parliament Buildings at Ottawa will be lighted by electricity during next session.

—The Ontario Parliament met in Toronto on the 10th inst., elected a Speaker, the speech from the Throne delivered and the house adjourned until the first of March.

—Over $30,000 is paid into Toronto treasury for Tavern and Shop Licenses.

—The horizon of the east is decidedly war-like.

—The United States Senate still wrangle over the Canadian Fishery question. They don't appear to be a justice loving body.

—The G. T. R. line in the vicinity of Chatham has been flooded for several days stopping railway communication over that portion of the road, some 12 miles.

—Ninteen tail-twisters, resident at New Lexington, O., have petitioned Congress to negotiate for the cession of Canada to the United States. The most remarkable thing about this is that there should be only ninteen cranks in Ohio. There are more than that in the senate at Washington. The Baltimore Herald reminds them that Canada is not Alaska, to be bought and sold as the latter was. Just so, The man who buys Canada will find that he has invested in an elaborate lawsuit, a lively war and a large variety of funerals.

—It is not known for certain how many people perished in the recent railway accident on the Vermont Central, and a comparatively large number of those who did perish have not been idnetified and their names are not known. In view to the dreadful uncertainty in the minds of many who are missing friends or relatives, whom they have not heard from since before the day of the accident, the American journals declare that some reform in the passenger traffic system is necessary. It is suggested that all passenger trains should have lists as do the steamships. It would cost something both in money and time to keep such lists, but the difficulty of doing so would soon disappear. It is suggested that such lists would be useful for detective and police purposes.

MARKDALE CHEESE FACTORY.

The patrons of above factory, and others interested, met last Saturday at the Markdale House to wind up the business of the past season and to consider "way and means" for operating the same the coming year.

The results of the past three years, since the factory was established, are fairly satisfactory, and the outlook for the coming year are very encouraging The low price of cheese for some years past and especially the opening of the last season, has been the cause of a large number of factories in Canada and elsewhere closing down, while many others have gone into the manufacture of butter, turning their cheese factories into creamers, and these causes will have the effect of materially lessening the supply of cheese, which must end in an advance in price e'er long.

Canadian cheese commands the highest market price in England, and as there is sure to be a great falling off in the quantity of cheese manufactured in Canada the coming season, as there has also been in the past, those interested should take courage and give this branch of farming their special attention.

The profits may be greatly increased by every farmer within reach of the factory becoming a patron, and every patron sending all his milk. This would not increase the cost of manufacture, while it would add materially to the profits. It is an established fact that the more extensive a business can be done with a given expence, the greater the profits will be.

Then again in the matter of shipping, a buyer can afford to pay half a cent per lb more for a lot of 600 boxes than for 200, first, because he can buy the large lot in the same time and with same expense as the small lot and furthermore, it will take a car to ship 200 boxes while the same car will hold 600 and cost the same, thus saving the freight on the extra 400 boxes.

The profits of farming have been so small the past few years that darying is now looked upon as the safest and most profitable branch, and we hope to see the year 1887 one of special interest and largely increased profits in this branch of agriculture.

—The United States Congress, without a dissenting voice, has passed a bill making it a penal offence for any foreigner to take fish within the territoral waters of that country. If it is right for the United States to make and enforce such a law, why is it wrong for Canada to protect that which the United States admitted by the treaty of 1818 to be her property? If it is brutal for Canada to insist on the three mile limit, in which terms is the conduct of the United States to be characterzed ?

To The Electors

—OF—

SOUTH GREY.

Gentlemen.—In pursuance to the constitutional principle, that when there is any material extension of the Franchise, the House of Commons has been dissolved, and a new election will take place on Tuesday, 22nd February.

Having been chosen by the Liberal Conservative party as their Candidate, I beg to solicit your suffrage in the approaching contest.

If elected I shall give a fair support on all vital questions to the present Government, believing that it has shewn by its past record to be heartily in accord with the progressive spirit of the age, and that under its care the laws have been fairly and impartially administered, but on some questions I may be compelled to differ with it.

I shall favor the repeal of the present Franchise Act, and the substitution for it of Manhood Suffrage.

I believe there should be some radical change made in the constitution and functions of the Senate. or if this be not practicable then I should favor its abolition entirely.

The present fiscal system which gives protection to our manufactures has shewn itself to be successful and should be continued.

The depression existing in our agricultural interests and the small returns received by farmers from their investments and labors should engage the earnest and careful attention of our Legislators. Believing that the high rate of interest at which farmers are compelled to borrow money, causes a constant and large flow of their hard earnings to the capitalists of the old country, I think the Government should assume the control of the currency of the country, and that the necessary legislation should be passed to favor the establishment of Farmer's Banks, and the supply of cheap money to the agricultural classes.

Now that all the great public works rendered necessary by Confederation have been completed, I think the time has come to exercise the most rigid, careful and economical control of our expenditure, and to endeavor to carry out the affairs of the country without further increasing the public dept. Hoping my views will meet with your approbation and that you will favor me with your support and earnest co-operation.

I am, Gentlemen,
Your Obt. Servant,
David Jamieson

To the Editor of the STANDARD.

DEAR SIR.—Whereas a report has been circulated that the Trustees of Lily Oak School, Sec. No. 9, Holland, refused to let Mr. Masson hold a political meeting in their school house, we beg leave to state through the STANDARD that such a statement is utterly false and without foundation whatever.

Had we been asked for the School House we certainly would have granted it, but neither Mr. Masson's friends nor any other person either directly or indirectly ever asked for it, and the whole story is evidently the work of some one with a very fertile immagination who feels mortified that Mr. Masson's meeting at Lily Oak was such a failure, not even his own political friends deeming it worth while to attend.

From our own Correspondent.

Death has again visited our vicinity; Mr. Wm. Prichard who had lately started storekeeping at Vandeleur, has been ailing for some time from injuries received in the back some time ago. His remains were interred last Sunday.

Dr. Landerkin held a meeting at the stone School House last week to give an account of his stewardship, and also to show up the sins of omission and commission of the present government. M. Richardson of Flesherton was quite his match on the platform.

WHAT TRUE MERIT WILL DO.

The unprecedented sale of Boschee's German Syrup within a few years, has astonished the world. It is without doubt the safest and best remedy ever discovered for the speedy and effectual cure of Coughs, Colds and the severest Lung troubles. It acts in an entirely different principle from the usual prescriptions given by Physicians, it does not dry up the Cough and leave the seas still in the system, but on the contrary removes the cause of the trouble, heals the part affected and leaves them in a purely healthy condition. A bottle kept in the house for use when the disease make their appearance, will save doctor's bills and a long spell of serious illness. A trial will convince you of these facts. It is positively sold by all druggists and general in the land Price 75 cts., large bottles. E. O. W.

Cheese Factory Report.

The annual meeting of the patrons of Markdale Cheese Factory was held in the Sample room of Markdale House Markdale on Saturday last the 12th inst at 2 o'clock p. m,

It was shown by auditors report that the business was attended to by the several officers satisfactory and well. and although the factory did not do so large a business as done the two preceeding years yet the result was most gratifying.

From 464026 lbs milk supplied was made 45,555 lb cheese which sold for $4,429,24 everaging for 5 months almost $18.00 per cow after all expences were paid,

One thing seemed to impress the entire meeting and that was, that if the armers could be pursuaded to give the factory a liberal support: nothing about the farm now pays as well as cows.

It was then resolved to organize for another years business when the following officers were appointed.

Feeding Work Horses in Winter.

It is not a good plan to feed farm horses much grain during the winter, when they have little work to do. If put to labor, give them the usual feed; but when not at work, one-fourth of the amount of grain given during the busy season is enough. Of course, they must have all the good stover they wish. Horses do not need much grain at this season; and if given it, they do not have brisk appetite for it in spring, and likely will soon refuse to eat the amount of grain they need to keep them in good condition at hard work. If, however, the horses are fed almost altogether on stover during the winter, they will not refuse grain when put to work. Inaction is more apt than the severest exertions to produce indegestion; and if the horses are fed rich food during the winter, they are apt to meet the spring in poor condition. The necessary animal heat and fat can be made from stover, hay and corn fodder makes an excellent food for horses in winter. If any grain is fed it may well be corn, reserving the oats until the work season. The horses must be fed as regularly and carefully in winter as when they are at work. It will not do to give them heavy feed one day, when the weather is pleasent, and scanty feeds, later than usual in the morning and earlier in the evening, the next day, because the weather is severe. As for salting, the best plan is to keep salt always in a small compartment in one corner of the feed-box. If the horses are fed and watered regularly, given comfortable shelters, kept clean, supplied with salt. and given a teaspoonful of clean wood ashes in their feed every other day, they will not need condition powders. Whenever a man resorts to condition powders, he convicts himself of bad management of his horses,—[American Agriculturist for February.

FULL OF GRIT.

"The stage has gone, sir, but there's a widder lives here—and she has got a boy, and he'll drive you over. He's a nice fellow, and Deacon Ball lets him have his team for a trifle, and we like to get him a job whenever we can."

It was a hot day in July. Away up among the hills that make the lower slopes of Monadnock mountain a friend lay very ill. In order to reach his temporary home, one must take an early train for the nearest station, and trust to the lumbering old dusty coach that made a daily trip to Keene. The train was late, and the stage, after waiting a while, was gone. The landlord of the little white hotel appeared in his shirt sleeves, and, leaning his elbow on the balcony rail, dropped down on the hot and thirsty traveller what comfort could be extracted from the opening sentence of my sketch.

"Would he not come in and have some dinner?"

"Yes."

"Would he send round for the deacon's team?"

"Yes."

"And the boy?"

"Yes."

And the dinner was eaten, and the "team" came round—an open buggy and an old white horse, and just as we were seated the door of the little brown house over the way opened, and out rushed the "widder's boy."

In his mouth was the last morsel of his dinner. He had learned evidently how to "eat and run." His feet were clad in last winter's much worn boots, whose wrinkled, yellow legs refused to stay modestly within the limits of his trousers. As his legs flew forward his arms flew backward in an ineffectual struggle to get himself inside of a jacket that was much too short in the sleeves.

"There he is," said the hostler; "there's widder Beebe's boy. I told him I'd hold the deacon's horse while he went to get a bite."

The horse did not look as if he needed to be held, but the hostler got his dime, and the boy approached in time to relieve my mind as to whether he would conquer the jacket, or the jacket would conquer him, and turn him wrong side out.

He was sunbrowned and freckled, large mouthed, and red haired, a homely, plain, patched, little Yankee boy; and yet, as we rode along through the deep summer bloom and fragrance of the jaded road winding up the long hill in the glow of the afternoon sun, I learned such a lesson from that little fellow at my side as I shall not soon forget.

He did not look much like a minister, as he sat stooping forward a little, whisking the flies from the deacon's horse, but his sermon was one which might have been heard by all the boys in the land. He did not know he was preaching, or he would have stopped I think. As it was I had to spur him on now and then by questions, to get him to tell me all about himself.

"My father died, you see, and left mother the little brown house opposite the tavern. You saw it, didn't you, sir—the one with the lilac bushes under the window? Father was sick a long time, and when he could not work he had to raise money on the house. Deacon Ball let him have it, a little at a time, and when father was gone mother found the money owed was almost three hundred dollars. At first she thought she would have to give up the house, but the deacon said: 'Let us wait awhile,' and he turned to me, and patted me on the head, and said: 'When Johnny gets big enough to earn something I shall expect him to pay it.' I was only nine years old then, but now I am thirteen; I remembered it, and remembered how mother cried, and said: 'Yes, deacon, Johnny's my only hope now;' and I wondered what I could do. I really felt as if I ought to commence at once, and yet I could not think of anything I could do."

"Well, what did you do?" I asked, quickly, for I was afraid he would stop, and I wanted to hear the rest.

"Well, at first I did very funny things for a boy. My mother used to knit socks to sell, and he sewed the rags to make rag carpet, and—I helped."

"How? What could you do?"

"Well, the people who would like a carpet could not always get time to make it. So I went from house to house among the farmers, and took home their rags, old coats, and everything they had, and out in the woodshed I ripped and cut them up. Then mother sewed them, and sometimes I sewed some, too, and then I rolled them into balls and took them back to the owners, all ready to be woven into carpets."

"But did that pay you for your work?"

"Oh, yes; we got so much a pound, and I used to feel quite like a merchant, when I weighed them out myself with one of our steel yards. But that was only one way; we have two or three old apple trees out in the back yard by the wall, and we dried the apples and sold them. Then some of the farmers who had a good many apples began to send them to us to dry, and we paid them so many pounds all dried, and then had all the rest to sell."

"But surely you could not do much in ways like this?"

"No, not much, but something; and then we had the knitting."

"Did you knit?"

"Not at first, but after a while mother began to have the rheumatism in her hands, and the joints became swollen and the fingers twisted, and it hurt her to move them. Then I learned to knit; before that I always wound the yarn for her. I had to learn to sew a little, too, for mother did not like to see holes without patches."

And he looked half smiling at the specimens on his own knees.

"But you did not mend those?" I asked.

"Yes, sir, but I was in a hurry, and mother said it was not done as it ought to be. They had just been washed, and I could not wait for them to dry."

"Who washed them?"

"I did, and ironed them, too. I can wash and iron almost as well as mother could."

"But she does not let you do it?"

"She don't mean to have me, but how can she help it? She can hardly use her hands at all, and some days her feet are so bad she can hardly leave her chair. So I have had to learn to make the beds, and scrub the floor, and wash the dishes, and I can cook almost as well as a girl."

"Is it possible? I shall have to take supper with you on my way back to the city, and test your skill."

Johnny blushed, and I added:

"It's a pity, my boy, that you have no sister."

"I had one," he said, gently, "but she died; and—if she had lived, I wouldn't have wished her to life and bring wood and water, and scrub, as poor mother always did. Sometimes I wish I could have sprung all the way from a baby to a man. It's such slow work growing up, and it was while mother was waiting for us to grow up that she worked so hard."

"But, my dear boy, you can't expect to be son and daughter and daughter and mother, all in one. You can not do the work for the whole family?"

"Yes, I can; it isn't much, and I'm going to do it and the work my father left undone. I'm going to pay Deacon Ball that mortgage, if I live."

"Heaven grant you may," I said, fervently, under my breath, "for not many mothers have such a son."

"Mother does not know I mean to do it, and she is very anxious I should go to school and I mean to go some time; but I know where the boys in my class are studying, and I get the lessons at home. Mother reads them to me out of the book, while I am washing the dishes or doing her work, and when we come to anything we can't make out I take it over to the teacher in the evening, and she is very kind—she tells."

Very kind! Who would not be kind to such a boy? I felt the tears coming to my eyes at such a sudden vision of a son doing a girl's work, while his poor mother held the book in her twisted hands, and tried to help him to learn.

"But all this does not help to earn money Johnny. How do you expect to save if you give your time indoors?"

"Oh, I don't do girl's work all day; no, indeed. I have worked out my taxes on the road. It wasn't much, but I helped the men build a stone wall down by the river; and Deacon Ball let's me do a great many days' work for him, and when I get a chance to take any one from the hotel to ride, he lets me have his team for almost nothing, and I pay him whatever I make. And I work on the farm with the men in summer; and I have a cow of my own, and I sell the milk at the tavern; and we have some hens, too, and we sell the eggs. And in the fall I cut and pile wood in the sheds for people who haven't any boys—and there's a good many people about here who haven't any boys," he added, thoughtfully, brushing a fly from the old white horse with the tip of his whip.

After this we fell into silence, and rode on through the sweet New England roads, with Monadnock rising before us ever nearer and more majestic. It impressed me with a sense of its rugged strength—one of the hills "rock-ribbed and ancient as the sun"; but I glanced from the mountain to the little red-headed morsel of humanity at my side, with a sort of recognition of their kinship. Somehow they seemed to belong together. I felt as if the same sturdy stuff was in them both. It was only a fancy, but it was so confirmed the next day; for when I came back to town after seeing my invalid friend I went to call on Deacon Ball.

I found the deacon white-haired and kindly-faced. He kept the village store and owned a pretty house, and was very "well-to-do." Naturally we talked of Johnny, and the deacon said to me, with tears in his watery blue eyes:

"Why, bless your heart, sir, you don't think I'm going to take his money, do you? The only son of his mother, and she a widder, and all tied up into double bow-knots with the rheumatics besides! True enough, I let the father have the money, and my wife, she says, says she to me, 'Well, deacon, my dear, we've neither chick nor child, and we shall be just as well off a hundred years hence if the widder never pays a cent; but cording to my calklation it's better to let the boy think he's paying.' Says she to me, 'Deacon, you might as well try to keep a barrel of vinegar from working as to keep that boy. It's the mother in him, and it's got to work.' We think a good deal of the widder, Mandy and me. I did, before I ever saw Mandy; but for all that, we hold the mortgage, and Johnny wants to work it out. Mandy and me, we are agoin' to let him work."

I turned away, for I was to sup at Johnny's house; but before I went I asked the deacon how much Johnny had already paid.

"Well, I don't know; Mandy knows, I pass it to her, and she keeps the book. Drop in before you go to the train, and I'll show it to you."

I dropped in and the deacon showed me the account. It was the book of a savings bank of a neighboring town, and on its pages were credits of all the little sums the boy had earned or paid; and I saw they were standing to Widow Beebe's name. I grasped the deacon's hand. He was looking away over the house-tops to where Monadnock was smiling under the good-night kisses of the sun.

"Good-bye, sir, good-bye!" he said, returning my squeeze with interest. "Much obleeged, I'm sure, Mandy and me, too; but don't you be worried about Johnny! When we see it we know the real stuff it takes to make a man—and Johnny has got it; Johnny's like the mountain over there—chuck full of grit and lots of back bone."

Sleeplessness.

Daily worries, as they are fruitful causes of sleeplessness, should as far as possible be controlled if sleep is to be more than a dreamy drowsiness. Some men can throw off anxiety for a time when they go to rest; others, less gifted with self-control, ponder their troubles in their beds. The advantage of the former in every way is of course apparent. It was a prudent resolution which led the philosopher Kant to spend a quarter of an hour before he retired each night in abstracting his mind from its preoccupations; light sleepers might well adopt his method.

With Satisfaction.

Polson's Nerviline, the new and certain pain cure, is used with satisfaction in every instance. There is abundant reason for this, for it performs all that is claimed for it. Nerviline is a never-failing cure for cramps, pains in the side or back, lumbago, sore throat, chilblains, toothache. Nerviline is in fact a sure remedy for all pains, both internal and external. Catarrh, Catarrhal Deafness and Hay Fever.

Sufferers are not generally aware that these diseases are contagious, or that they are due to the presence of living parasites in the lining membrane of the nose and eustachian tubes Microscopic research, however, has proved this to be a fact, and the result is that a simple remedy has been formulated whereby catarrh, catarrhal deafness and hay fever are cured in from one to three simple applications made at home. A pamphlet explaining this new treatment is sent free on receipt of stamp by A. H. Dixon & Son, 308 King Street West, Toronto, Canada.

HOUSEHOLD.

Amusements for Small Children.

"What shall we do next?" is an inquiry often propounded by the average small child, who, unless it is an exceptional specimen, exhausts its stock of amusements at least once in every twenty four hours.

The inquiry very often proves a hard-to-solve problem to whoever has the child in charge, for the supposed allurements of discarded playthings are set forth in vain, and all suggestions that it is not yet tired of doing this, or should still want to do that, are met with flat, emphatic, and not-to-be-reconsidered denials.

Who has not encountered days when the small occupants of the nursery were kept prisoners within its walls by such insurmountable obstacles as pelting rain or driving snow, slight illness or tedious convalescence, and all indoor amusements seemed to have lost their charm, the best beloved toys been cast petulantly aside, and all efforts to better the existing state of affairs proved unequal to the exigencies of the case?

Such combination of circumstances being of not infrequent occurrence in many households where this paper makes its weekly visit, its readers may welcome a few of ten-tried devices, whereby at such times peace and comfort for the elders and contentment and pleasure for the children have been secured by very trifling outlay of time, trouble, and money.

Children under seven or eight years old need in their amusements a good deal of oversight and assistance from older heads, and cannot get along without. It is one thing to amuse children, and another to lead them to amuse themselves. The first makes a slave of whoever has them in charge, the latter makes them plan and think for themselves, and secures for the mother or nurse time to devote to other things.

Even small children usually possess considerable ingenuity and inventive faculties, and, while they are not equal to the task of always finding amusements for themselves, will, when given articles to play with, turn them to a much greater variety of uses than was thought of by their elders when they provided them.

Very simple things will give pleasure and secure the desired quiet. Something which yields children as great an amount of satisfaction as anything that can be provided for them is empty spools. Not just a string of a dozen or so, such as is often provided for the delectation of their more infantile days, but spools and spools and spools—spools of all sizes, and on such astounding plans that almost anything the small possessor's ambitious mind desires can be accomplished with them.

By saving all that are emptied of thread in the natural course of the family sewing and needlework and begging contributions from willing friends, the supply will soon amount up into the hundreds, and even a thousand spools can soon be collected.

For a trifling consideration to pay for the trouble of saving them, one wise mother secured eight hundred spools from one large establishment, where dozens of sewing-machines kept up a busy hum from morning till night. To these were added the supply already on hand, making a collection varying in size from the tiny one which had held the very finest thread or buttonhole twist, to the large spools on which had been wound the coarsest linen thread.

They are the acknowledged property of a small girl and boy, whose united ages do not exceed eight years, but they also furnish a vast amount of amusement for an older brother and sister, who would think it much beneath their dignity to own them, and are always extremely careful to call them "the children's spools" whenever they allude to them.

Household Hints.

Mica in stoves, when smoked, is readily cleaned by taking it out and thoroughly washing it with vinegar a little diluted. If the black does not come off at once, let it soak a little.

APPLE FLOAT.—One pint stewed apples sweetened and flavored to taste when cold. Just before sending to table, stir lightly into it the beaten whites of four eggs. Serve with cream.

BOSTON BROWN BREAD.—Two and one-half cupfuls sour milk and one-half cupful molasses; one heaping teaspoonful soda stirred into these, two cupfuls cornmeal, one cupful graham flour, one teaspoonful salt. Steam three hours or longer.

CORN BREAD.—To one quart of sour milk add one teaspoonful soda, three eggs, two tablespoonfuls lard or butter, one tablespoonful sugar, a pinch salt, a handful wheat flour, and enough sifted cornmeal to make a good batter. Bake in a dripping pan.

CHICKEN DRESSING.—Thicken the water the chicken was boiled in with cornmeal, and boil until the meal is cooked; then stir in two well beaten eggs; season with pepper, salt and sage; put in the chicken and bake until nicely browned.

GRAHAM BREAD.—One pint tepid water, three-fourths cupful syrup or brown sugar, one teaspoonful salt, one cupful oatmeal, one pint light sponge; add enough graham flour to make a stiff batter; drop in pans, let rise, and bake in a slow oven one hour.

TOMATO SOUP WITH MILK.—Stew two tomatoes and strain them through a sieve, putting a little soda into the tomato. Boil the milk, thicken with cornstarch, and season to taste. Heat the tomato boiling hot and mix with the boiling milk and send to the table at once.

POTATO BALLS.—Three cupfuls mashed potatoes with two spoonfuls butter; then add one half cupful grated Holland cheese and mash well together, then add two well beaten eggs, and mix well; now roll into small, round cakes, in grated bread crumbs, and fry in hot lard.

PARSNIP OYSTERS.—Boil parsnips until tender and mash well. To a pint of mashed parsnip add one tablespoonful butter, three well beaten eggs, salt and pepper to taste, and sufficient flour to hold the mixture together. Make into small flat balls and fry in butter until brown.

MOUNTAIN SNOW PUDDING.—One and a half pints milk, two milk crackers rolled, beaten yelks of three eggs, flavor and bake twenty minutes, then spread the beaten whites and three tablespoonfuls sugar over the top, and return to the oven until slightly browned. Very nice and delicate.

POTATO PUFFS.—Take two cupfuls mashed potatoes and stir into them two tablespoonfuls melted butter, beating to a white cream before adding anything else. Then add two eggs beaten very light, a teacupful cream or milk, and salt to taste. Beat all well together, and bake in a quick oven until nicely browned.

SUGAR POP CORN.—One half cupful sugar, one-fourth cupful water and one teaspoonful butter, boil together until it is quite thick in a large pan (a deep pan is best), then sprinkle in two quarts of nicely popped corn, stirring all the while, take it off the stove and stir until the kernels all separate. It is very good without the butter.

SWEET APPLE INDIAN PUDDING.—Scald thoroughly one cupful of Indian meal and one cupful of chopped sweet apples in a quart of boiling milk (skimmed), add two-thirds cupful molasses, one teaspoonful salt and one of ginger, also a pint of cold milk. Bake in a covered dish from three to four hours. This eaten with sweet cream is delicious.

COCOANUT LAYER CAKE.—Two eggs, one cupful sugar, two-thirds cupful milk, one-half cupful butter, two cupfuls flour, two heaping teaspoonfuls baking powder. Bake the same as jelly cake. Spread a thin layer of frosting sprinkled with prepared cocoanut. Bake in three layers. Frosting: The whites two eggs, eight teaspoonfuls sugar, and flavor to suit.

COFFEE.—To make coffee on the French plan, pour boiling water once or twice through the finely-ground coffee in a cloth sack or fine strainer; but when eggs are cheap there is no better way than to mix the coffee with half an egg, pour on the boiling water, and set the pot for five minutes in a very hot place where it will just keep from boiling.

SUET PUDDING.—One cupful suet, chopped fine, one cupful raisins, one cupful zante currants, one small cupful black molasses, one teaspoonful soda, one cupful sweet milk, one teaspoonful cinnamon, one teaspoonful ground cloves, a little salt, three cupfuls flour. Steam four hours, or until you can run a broom straw into it without any of the ing to it. dough stick

Killed by a Pencil.

A Columbia correspondent of the Atlanta Constitution writes: C. H. Barber, a merchant of Florence, died the other day, from the result of a strange accident. One day about two months ago, while standing in front of his store, he was approached from behind by a friend, who playfully threw his arms around Barber's neck. A scuffle ensued in which Barber's head was drawn downward and his right eye brought in contact with the sharp point of a small lead pencil sticking out of the friend's vest pocket. The pencil, which was about an inch and a quarter long, penetrated the eye, and became so completely embedded therein, as to baffle the efforts of the surgeon to extract it. After remaining in the eye about six week's the pencil worked itself out, and it was then thought that, with the exception of the loss of the eye, Mr. Barber would suffer no other inconvenience, but in a few days it became evident that the lead had poisoned the optic nerve, and soon after the brain became similarly affected. Barber lingered in great agony until yesterday, when he died. The autopsy showed that the brain had literally rotted away.

A Good Reason.

"So you have a new cook, have you?"

"Yes, the old one left us, so we got another."

"Is she a good one?"

"No, she can't boil water."

"Why do you keep her, then?"

"Because she ain't particular about her pay, and is not continually dunning me at inopportune times."

My Boys.

BY HANS GOEBEL.

I sit alone in the twilight
And dream of the days gone by,
When here with the shadows we gathered,
My beautiful boys and I.

The years have passed, O how swiftly;
It seems only yesterday
That Jack and Harry and baby Fred
Were here at my feet at play.

But where to-night are my beautiful boys,
My Jack and Harry and Fred?
Oh, friend, only one am I sure of,
And he is the one that's dead.

My Jack, a soldier so wond'rous brave,
You'll find in the thickest fight,
But low sinks my heart as for him I cry,
"O, where is my boy to-night?"

You ask me of my other son.
How his blue eyes used to shine;
Alas, their light is darkened by
The fatal spirit of wine.

I bow my head and fervently plead
For both these my boys to-night,
Believing that He who has promised so much
Some day will remove the blight.

And I praise him for a vision
Of a cause triumphant, grand,
That bears inscribed on its banners,
"God, Home, and Native Land."

My heart is full, so full, as I think
Of Jack and Harry and Fred.
Yet I thank my Heavenly Father for
The baby boy that's dead.

A Greater Love.

BY NORA LAUGHER.

"God is Love,
To this, His spirit shall our spirit mould,
While, touched by prayer the gates of Heaven unfold.
Fresh from the sun the light each morn is given,
Then let thy soul seek daily light from Heaven."

"All, all is false, nothing is true!"
I cried in agony,
For one I loved more than life
Had roamed afar from me.
Lo! as I thus bitterly spoke
I passed a building grey,
At whose ancient doors the people
Were entering to pray.
Heart-weary and sorrow-laden
I entered the aisle dim,
The choristers were singing
A grand old evening hymn;
And my grief and sorrow vanished
With the sweet sound above,
Their angelic voices told me
Of a far greater Love.

The Death of Schiller.

BY W. A. SHERWOOD.

Slowly, slowly sinks the day-star
'Neath the waves of purpling light,
Like a holy freighted vessel
Fading palely from our sight.
As the waters that between us
Rise in long red lines and screen us.

Lo! yon moon, in veil of crimson
Mounts the orient even' sky;
Sadly from her imperial throne
Weeps her waning destiny
Her lonely dirge across the sky—
Must every living creature die!

"Raise my head," cried dying Schiller,
"Let me see the setting sun;
To-morrow," cried the poet,
And His promise will be done.
"Now think me to the stars," he cried,
And blessing all around, he died.

HEALTH.

Corn as Food for Man.

The time was when corn meal was the principle food for the inhabitants of this section of the world. Wheat bread was rare. The corn product, hogs, whiskey, and almost the only article of great value in this section of the country at that time. People who were raised on this corn bread, etc., have never lost their taste for it. Those who were boys during this corn period, and have grown up to prosperity or otherwise, have never forgotten its taste. Of this class are the older people of the present time, and among them we will find the corn bread made in the same old way as a part of their food once or twice a week, if not once or twice a day. And then there is the fried pickled pork which goes with it and gratifies the appetite long ago formed. As the country grew more prosperous, subsequent to the universal corn period of which we speak, wheat bread came into very general use, and even now among the younger people there are many who know little, if anything, of the taste of corn bread, though some of the other corn products are not entirely neglected. For many years past corn goods have been neglected, and it is only within the recent past that changes have been made in this direction. The new processes of corn milling have had something to do with it. The corn products are more inviting, they are of a better quality than before. Men of business push are behind the corn mills of the present time, and they are taking measures to educate the general public taste favorable to corn foods, and the possibilities are strongly in their favor, for the reason that in corn food we find a meritorious product which has only to be pushed to find a more general recognition. We notice an advertisement of a corn product of one of the largest establishments of its kind in this country, though as the advertisement reads no one would suspect that the food was a corn product, it being disguised under another name. It is stated that it is more digestible than buckwheat when made into cakes as a hundred is greater than thirty-seven, and by an exact analysis its true food valne is greater than buckwheat as a hundred is than thirty-four. There can be no doubt that the public at large is not fully conversant with the possibilities of corn foods. The dishes that may be prepared from its various forms are a much greater variety than from the products of wheat, and because of the merit that there is in corn foods, we may expect to see and know of its rapid progress in the favor of the inhabitants of this and other civilized nations.

Prevention of Diphtheria.

Diphtheria is a dreadful disease at any time, especially does it become so when it breaks out in a family of children or in a school. It is both dangerous and contagious. The germs are easily carried in clothes, from one person to another. Probably the best disinfectant is sulphur. Besides preventing the spread of diphtheria, sulphur has a salutary effect on those already afflicted. Great care should be taken in schools. No children should be allowed to attend from families where the disease already exists. The schoolroom should be thoroughly fumigated every day after school hours. In families where there are two or three afflicted at the same time, they should be isolated and confined in one bed room, and all the children not afflicted should remain in a secluded room or, if feasible, should be removed entirely from the the house. In any case every room in the house should be fumigated with sulphur two or three times daily. An easy way of fumigating is to drop a pinch of sulphur on a hot stove, or if a stove is lacking, a few coals on a shovel will answer the purpose. A little experience will determine the amount of sulphur needed for each room. It is not necessary to fill the room to suffocation. If the fume is offensive the windows can be raised for a minute or two.

There are other useful disinfectants, but sulphur is as good as the most expensive. We breathe freely its fumes and our clothes become saturated with them. Families having fear for their children would do well to fumigate daily. This will often prevent outbreaks of diphtheria in families who would otherwise suffer. In any event the use of sulphur can do no harm.

Tight Lacing.

Mr. Richard A. Proctor, the well known lecturer on astronomy, once tried the experiment of wearing a corset, and thus describes the result: "When the subject of corset wearing was under discussion in the pages of the English Mechanic, I was struck," he says, "with the apparent weight of evidence in favor of tight-lacing. I was in particular struck by the evidence of some as to its use in reducing corpulence. I was corpulent. I also was disposed, as I am still, to take an interest in scientific experiment. I thought I would give this matter a fair trial. I read all the instructions, carefully followed them, and varied the time of applying pressure with that 'perfectly stiff busk' about which correspondents were so enthusiastic. I was foolish enough to try the thing for a matter of four weeks. Then I laughed at myself as a hopeless idiot, and determined to give up the attempt to reduce by artificial means that superabundance of fat on which only starvation and much exercise, or the air of America, has ever had any real reducing influences. But I was reckoning without my host. As the Chinese lady suffers, I am told, when her feet-bindings are taken off, and as the flat-head baby howls when his head-boards are removed, so for awhile was it with me. I found myself manifestly better in stays. I laughed at myself no longer. I was too angry with myself to laugh. I would as soon have condemned myself to using crutches all the time, as to wearing always a busk. But for my own month of folly I had to endure three months of discomfort. At the end of about that time I was my own man again.

Twelve Rules for the Care of the Ears.

1. Never put anything into the ear for the relief of toothache.

2. Never wear cotton in the ears if they are discharging pus.

3. Never attempt to apply a poultice to the inside of the canal of the ear.

4. Never drop anything into the ear unless it has been previously warmed.

5. Never use anything but a syringe and warm water for cleansing the ears from pus.

6. Never strike or box a child's ear, as this has been known to rupture the drum-head, and cause [illegible]

7. Never wet the hair, if you have any [illegible]; wear the oilcloth cap [illegible] refrain from diving.

8. Never tickle the ears with anything but the finger, if they itch. Do not use the head of a pin, hair pins, pencil tips, or anything of that nature.

9. Never let the feet become cold and damp, or sit with the back toward the window, as these things tend to aggravate any existing hardness of hearing.

10. Never put milk, fat, or any oily substance into the ear for the relief of pain, for they soon become rancid and tend to incite inflammation. Simple warm water will answer the purpose better than anything else.

11. Never be alarmed if a living insect enters the ear. Pouring warm water into the canal will drown it, when it will generally come to the surface, and can be easily removed by the fingers. A few puffs of tobacco smoke blown into the ear will stupefy the insect.

12. Never meddle with the ear if a foreign body, such as a bead, button, or seed enters it; leave it absolutely alone, but have a physician attend to it. More damage has been done by injudicious attempts at the extraction of a foreign body than could ever come from its presence in the ear.

Health Notes.

Fothergill stated some time ago that beef-tea is rather a stimulant than a nourishment, and now an article appears in the Nineteenth Century, showing that it powerfully retards digestion. This action is said to be due to the organic acids contained in it.

Virchow says that beer-drinkers have hyper trophied kidneys. This condition is due to the constant state of congestion in which the organ must be maintained in order that it may perform the extra work demanded of it in elimating the beer from the system.

In cases of undue sweating of the feet, accompanied by soreness and whitening of the skin of the sole, a cure may be readily effected by the application, once a day, of equal parts of citrine ointment and ung. aq. rosæ. The feet should be bathed frequently.

A growing inability to sleep in sickness is ominous of a fatal result; in apparent health it indicates the failure of the mind and madness; so, on the other hand, in disease or dementia, a very slight improvement in the sleeping should be hailed as the harbinger of restoration.

A bad breath may be cured as follows, no matter what the cause: Three hours after breakfast a teaspoonful of the following mixture: Chlorate of potash, two drachms; sweetened water, four ounces; wash the mouth occasionally with the mixture, and the breath will be as sweet as an infant's.

In cerebral exhaustion, active muscular exercise in reasonable amount and variety may be allowed and enjoyed; in spinal exhaustion, relative and in some cases absolute rest is demanded, or only passive exercise for a shorter or longer time, as may be according to special peculiarities of the individual.

The following liniment is recommended for earache: Camphorated chloral 2½ parts, pure glycerine 16½ parts, and oil of sweet almonds 10 parts. This is to be well mixed and preserved in an hermetically sealed bottle. Applications may be made by means of a pledget of soft cotton soaked in the liniment and put in the ear twice a day.

Tragic Deaths of English Statesmen.

It is observed that Lord Iddesleigh's death is by no means the first tragic or sudden death of an English statesman in recent history, as during the present century there have been several. The younger Pitt died while Premier in 1806 from broken spirits, caused by the defeats of our allies on the Continent; and Fox, when Foreign Secretary, followed him to a premature tomb a few months later. Percival, who was Prime Minister in 1812, was assassinated in the lobby of the House of Commons, and Lord Londonderry, when Foreign Minister in 1821, committed suicide. Lord Liverpool, the Premier in 1827, was seized with an apoplectic fit, from which he never rallied. Canning, his successor, died after being Prime Minister for a few months from combined work and worry. Tierney, who was a Minister under Canning, died of heart disease in his chair in 1830. Huskisson, who had also served under Canning, was killed while shaking hands with the Duke of Wellington at the opening of the Liverpool and Manchester railway, in 1830, and Sir Robert Peel was killed by a fall from his horse on Constitution Hill, twenty years later. These, with the murder of Lord Frederick Cavendish, in the Phœnix park, in 1882, form a list of the sudden and tragic deaths of English statesmen during the present century.

A Great Slave-Hunting Region.

The country between the Zambesi river and the lake regions of central Africa is one of the great slave-hunting grounds of that dark continent. An English traveler who recently journeyed through the country says that every village shows the familiar sight of the slave in the yoke awating the departure of a caravan. This yoke is made from the forked branches of a tree; about five or six feet long—some are much longer and from three to four inches in diameter at the thickest part. Through each prong of the fork a hole is bored for the reception of an iron pin. This ready, a soft, fibrous bark, is wrapped round until the whole forms a thick collar of bark, making a sort of pad much rougher than a horse's collar. It is often allowed to remain upon a slave for nine months or a year, night and day, without being once taken off. When a caravan is ready to start the men are coupled by the yoke being lashed so as to form a rigid pole, binding the pair from neck to neck together. With loads on their heads, they then turn their faces to the eastward and leave their homes forever.

Courage.

Unless a man is fearful, he cannot be courageous. Unless he realises danger, and is on the watch against it, he lacks the elements of a soldierly character. A child might be fearless on a picket line in time of war, but his fearlessness would not be courageousness, nor yet a substitute for it. True courage lies in the intelligent recognition of danger and [illegible] determined facing of the danger [illegible] Virtue is more than innocence. [illegible] be tickled to [illegible] might be [illegible] [illegible] a raw [illegible]

FARM.

When to Sow Grass Seed.

Some farmers sow their grass seed on the snow, trusting to the even distribution thereof by the downward tendency of water and the use of the farm roller for covering after the frost has finished upheaving the soil, says the Philadelphia Record, but it is doubtful if the practice of sowing clover and other grass seeds so early in the season is the proper mode. Although such seeds do not easily lose vitality, yet there is damage done by the cold, and the hungry birds do not miss the opportunity to take their share, while the proper "catch" largely depends upon the condition of the soil.

It has been demonstrated that when the harrow is used over the growing wheat early in the spring the result is beneficial, and it is when the wheat is harrowed that the grass seed should be sown, if grass is to follow a grain crop. It is important that the seeds be covered, and if the field be harrowed there will be less loss of seed and greater chances for a good stand. As an application of nitrate of soda on wheat in the spring pushes it forward very rapidly it soon reaches sufficient height to shield the young clover from the extreme heat of the sun, while the clover will at the same time make sufficient growth better to endure the warm weather. The harrow may also be usefully employed to mix the fertilizer with the soil at the same time.

The ground upon which the seed is to be sown deserves more attention than the grain crop, the grass seed or the mode of cultivation, for if the grass crop be intended as a permanent pasturage it must not be overlooked that weeds will spring up to compete with the grass, and for that reason the ground must be very clean. It is best, therefore, that the wheat crop to be grown should be on land that was previously in corn, as the extra cultivation required for corn better prepares the land not only for wheat but for the grass which is to follow. If, after the corn crop is off, the land is put in rye, which may be plowed under in the spring, and millet or buckwheat sown and plowed under when green, and wheat sown in the fall following, the ground should be in a very clean condition, and fitted for any crop.

Making Good Milkers.

No matter what breed you have, says a writer in the Practical Farmer, something further is necessary in order to reach the best success in raising good milkers. Good blood, whether Shorthorn, Jersey, Devon, Aryshire, grade, or native is not everything, but lies at the foundation. Something cannot come from nothing. Treatment in raising a milker should be something different from that in raising a beef animal or an animal for labor. Begin as soon as the calf is a day old; see that it has sufficient to eat and is kindly treated and regularly attended to. Never pamper or overfeed, but give it good, generous food, to cause a regular, early and steady growth. Accustom it to be handled, but not to such an extent as to acquire objectionable habits as a cow, but rather to be fond of the presence of the keeper. Kindness helps to create a quiet disposition so important in the dairy cow, and this education must begin when the calf is young. Any habits acquired when young are apt to cling to the cow when grown. For a milker I would have the heifer come in at two years old. She is then old enough to become a cow. I would not, as a rule, allow her to go farrow, but milk her up to within a few weeks of calving, even if I did not obtain but little at a milking. A cow thus trained will give more milk and be more likely to hold out long in milk if her after care is judicious and liberal, as it should be. Such treatment tends to form the habit of giving milk, and, as we know, habit is a sort of second nature. Couple the heifer with an older bull—one, two or three years older than she is preferable to a yearling—and better stock is likely to come from such. After the heifer has come in her feed should be regular and liberal. Good clover hay is the best of all, but we all may not have this for stall feed; then we must make up for what is lacking in some concentrated food, such as oatmeal, shorts, oilmeal or the like, but great care and good judgment must be used not to overfeed.

Light and Heavy Hay.

In the various rules for estimating the amount of hay in bulk not enough difference is allowed for the variation in weight depending on the condition when cured, the exposure to rains and other causes. The same sorts will have much less weight in proportion to bulk after being dried out by a cold winter. Hay that has been bleached by long exposure to rains will always be light in weight, and be proportionately less valuable than even its weight would indicate. The soluble juices which give hay its greatest value have been washed out by rains, leaving an undue proportion of woody fiber. There is, besides, a considerable variation in the original constituents of grass and hay, depending on the character of the soil on which it is grown. Farmers on wet, mucky and overflowed land complain that their large crops of hay do not pan out well when brought to the weighing scales. Timothy grown on such soil has coarse, hollow stems, with smaller proportion of leaves. Such soils are often deficient in mineral fertilizers, and a dressing of phosphate when the land is seeded makes the crop better and the hay richer and heavier. Still this coarse hay is salable and does not exhaust the soil as does hay grown on upland. This may be one reason why the bulk of hay sold is grown on low, mucky and overflowed lands.

Storing Hay with Straw.

Where the hay is put up rather green it may be saved in good condition for feeding by mixing with straw. The surplus moisture of the grass is absorbed, and with it much of the aroma which gives good hay its delicate flavor. It can hardly be said that the nutritive value of the straw has been made equal to hay by this process, for its constituents have not been changed. But in making straw more palatable there is a decided gain in its nutritive value, as whatever is eaten with a relish is digested so much better than that which is not. If straw and hay are to be stored together next summer the straw must be saved in good condition now. Many farmers who well know the benefit from this practice scarcely ever try it, for the reason that at haying time the old straw is all gone, and that from the new grain crop is not yet threshed.

IT is now fairly established that common wart, which is so uncertain and often proliferous on the hands and face, says the Medical Press, can be easily removed by small doses of sulphate magnesia taken internally. M. Colrat. of Lyons, has drawn attention to this extraordinary fact Several children treated with three-grain doses of Epsom salts, morning and evening, were promptly cured. M. Bubers cites the case of a woman whose face was disfigured by these excrescences, and who was cured in a month by a drachm and a half of magnesia taken daily. Another medical man reports a case of very large warts which disappeared in a fortnight from the daily administration of ten grains of the salts.

HO FOR MUSKOKA.—A little over a week ago three Markdale boys, in the neighborhood of 14 years of age, took it into their heads to go to Muskoka on a hunting and trapping expedition, and perhaps start a Colony. They made great preperations for the undertaking, wholy unknown to their parents. When all was ready the start was made, and in order to evade suspicion they kept clear of the Station and went to the tank which is nearly 80 rods east of the station and where the trains usually halt for water. There they were in readiness to board the train, but to their chagrin, the iron horse didn't want water this time and hurried past. Nothing daunted they started on afoot, and it being well on towards dark they had to camp out for the night. The following day before pulling up stakes they were surprised by the parent of one of the lads who appeared on the scene. and hastily broke up their calculations. They had in store several pairs of boots, socks, a web of flannel, a chunk of beef, some bottled whiskey, $20 in cash and several other articles. They had evidently been reading "Jessie James" or some other novels of wild adventures, but their reckless trip was nipped in the bud.

The annual tea-meeting of the Methodist Church, Town Line, near Harkaway will be held on Thursday next, 3rd March. Tea from 5 to 7 o'clock. A good program is prepared, and a cordial invitation is extended to all, especially the Markdale people. Admission 25 cents.

—Wednesday was a red letter day for the woman suffragists. The Governor of Kansas signed a bill passed by the Legislature of that State giving women the ballot in municipal elections. On the same day the Senate of the State of New York, by the very decided majority of 20 to 9 passed a similar measure. There is no question about the sincerity of the Kansas action, for the bill has become a law there. But, says the New York World, the presumption is that the Senate at Albany did not vote in good faith.

MY GRANDFATHER.

The Secret of an Old Man's Life.

The last remnants of the dinner had been removed from the table; the curtains were drawn across the windows; the oil lamp was placed between us; the fire roared up the chimney; we faced each other in two armchairs, my grandfather and I. It was the anniversary of his birthday, and I, his grandson, the only relative he had left in the world, had spent the day at his fireside, more in pity for his loneliness than for any love of kinship. They said I should inherit the large fortune he had acquired, none knew how; but the life of this strange old man had ever been an enigma to the few who were intimate with him, and none could foresee from day to day in which direction the next seeming freak of his folly would lie.

So I was dining with him on the ninetieth anniversary of his birthday; and when the repast was finished, we had drawn up the great armchairs, and in silence I watched the deep glow of the firelight play upon his haggard face, as he seemed to search the inmost depth of the blaze with his piercing and outstanding eyes. His life had been a mystery to those who had known him; for years he had lived in that little house with but one servant; and it was only on anniversaries of his birthday that I dined at his table. It was on such occasions as these that I had learned enough of the old man's life to know that some heavy secret lay on his mind, that some one act in his long span of existence had marred and seared the remaining years. The fevered mutterings, the staring eyes, the long fits of abstraction, followed by hoarse pleading, as if for pity, had told their tale. Occasional mention, too, of early days in Paris—of spectacles there that had dulled the courage of stoutest hearts, of woman and men dying at the hands of fanatic Republicans, of little children falling in the widespread sacrifice—all these led me to believe that it was in Paris that my grandfather had spent his early years, with Paris and with the past that his secret lay. More I knew not; more I dared not ask, for I was always ill at ease in the company of this strange old man, whose very eccentricities repelled the least advance.

Would he ever tell me more? was the question I asked myself that night; and as I watched the quivering lip and the trembling eyes, and heard from time to time the muttered prayer, I felt that his secret would perish with him. But I was mistaken, for suddenly he turned his chair from the fire, and clutching the arm of it as if with determined purpose, he began to speak in a low and solemn voice. In a minute I learned that the time had come; the mystery would be hidden no longer.

"Grandson," he said, "it comes to every man at a certain season to know that the end of his life is not far distant, that the day is approaching when he must face his Maker. When such a season is come to a man, it behooves him to think of those who will inherit his possessions when he is gone. I have thought over this difficult question, and I have made my decision. You are my only relative; you will inherit such property as I possess; but more than this, you will learn from me that which no doubt has often troubled you, the secret of an old man's life. It has not escaped you, this weight that lies upon my soul and threatens to crush it. Others have often questioned me; an idle curiosity tempted them to do so; you have shown your sense and held your peace. Your discretion has not escaped me; it shall be rewarded by a gratification of your suppressed curiosity, painful though it may be for me to give it. You have learned from the words that have escaped me that images of the past rise ever before me, images that never leave me day or night, that carry me back again to Paris and to my crime.

The old man paused a moment here, for emotion was working strong within him; then recovering himself, he went on hurriedly:

"My father, himself a man of letters, decided to educate me for a literary profession. With sense and discrimination he planned for me a scheme of education which embodied a wide range of reading and of travel. I was to work my way at Eton, to study for a time at Cambridge, then to seek the great centres of learning upon the continent and to finish in the richly stored liberaries of the East. It was a grand idea, worthy of a noble and generous man. Alas that his generosity was so thrown away!

"I went to Eton, and passed through the school, making friends here, gaining honors there, learning something of the classics, and of those difficulties and disappointments that face us all when we start on the battle-filed of life. At Cambridge I was a scholar and took honors. I remember now the gladness of my poor father when the news came to him that I had mounted one rung of the ladder before me. I hear again his hearty words of congratulation, feel again the warm pressure of his hand, undergo once more the welcome labor of writing to my mother. It was a happy time, for I was full of hope and confidence in my own powers, and around me were those whose every thought breathed a prayer for my welfare and happiness.

"Then it came that I should set out for Paris. It was with reluctance that they let me leave home, for at that date the first murmurs of the mighty torrent of revoultion which swept over France were beginning to be heard. The writings of Voltaire and Rouseau were commencing to bear their fruit. Agitators in the byways were decrying the King and demanding liberty; as the low moaning of the wind before the storm, so were these the warnings of what was to come. But I had no fears then; rather I hoped to learn much from seeing a country whose people had commenced to test the truths which the great philosophers of so many years had preached in their writings and in their teachings. You must remember, too, that none could then foresee that under the cloak of freedom men would loose their instincts of humanity, and would become as wild beasts; that rapine and vice would prevail where virtue and goodness had been; that women and children would be sacrificed to ambition and to fear; that the land would die under the curse of misrule. My father could not foresee this, or I should never have left the comfortable home in the midlands and have faced the dangers that soon awaited me in Paris. When I arrived in that great capital, it was hard to believe that beneath that gayety and brightness lay hidden a great stratum of discontent and poverty and crime. It was yet harder to believe, as one heard the frenzied cries of welcome that greeted King and Queen, that the cries were a mockery, that the voices were but empty sounds. That was the year 1788, and the Bastille had not yet fallen; Pitt himself scarce gave heed to the rumors. Why then should I, a student, foresee beneath this wealth of loyalism a rising power that would crush and kill both the landers and the landed?

"So I began my studies at the Univeristy. Making few friends, retiring to my lonely rooms at night with my books, I had little opportunity for noting the changes that spread so rapidly over the political and even the private life of the country. Yet the first comings of the approaching storm did not escape me. One day a student, who had frequently made overtures of friendship, chanced to talk with me in the library of the University. I was handling some old folios of the Fathers and noting the opinions of the great French theological thinkers, when, pulling me by the arm, he said: 'My friend, why waste your time? Do you not know that Frenchmen no longer believe in such books as these?' I stared at the speaker, and the volume fell from my hand as he poured his insidious words into my ears. Then, for very shame, I quitted the building and retired to my own rooms. I pictured to myself the old home with the village church, where purity and belief went hand in hand, and I shuddered lest a rumor of that which I had heard should ever enter that quiet community. But, thank God, my own life was never tainted with their words; my ears refused to receive their mockery, and their blasphemy.

"The student who had so advised me came to my rooms one evening with an invitation to his club to hear a great speaker. Though I was no friend of the boy, my curiosity led me to accompany him, that I might assure myself that the pretended agitation was but the work of a few fanatics. I entered the hall. It was crowded with some hundreds of students and workers and rascals, the last apparently drawn from the worst slums of Paris. A man upon the platform, with fervid oration advised the extermination of King and nobles. His words were at times drowned by the storm of applause they occasioned. I learned afterwards that the man who spoke was Jean Paul Marat, and that there were many such clubs as the one I had that night attended. The fanatics then were many; in a short time we were able to say that they were a majority in the city.

"From that date the tide of revolution flowed fast. In the succeeding year the Bastille fell, and France, nay, Europe, rejoiced as, from that relic of despotism and darkness, the prisoners were restored to the light of day. I was before the gates as the mob of women and of men perpetrated that wonderful and surprising deed, and never did I witness a multitude that displayed such a vivid resolution and such united action. But a glance at the mass of upturned and repulsive faces showed the danger of trifling with people who regarded no sacrifice of human life too great for the accomplishment of their purpose.

"It was shortly after such an event that, walking with a fellow-student near the palace of Versailles, a carriage passed us on its way to Paris. The vehicle was occupied by an aged man and a girl, who must have been but twenty years old. It was in the springtime, and the woods were white with blossoms, and the cottages filled with the scent of the May flowers; and as the carriage came slowly along the hard road from a chateau that stood upon a neighboring hill, I felt that one occupant of it at least was worthy of the glorious picture that nature unfolded around us. Ah, Marie! how can I find words to speak of you? Grandson, it is enough to say that since that hour her face has been before me day and night, sleeping and waking, in prosperity or misfortune. Everywhere I look I see those eyes of hers speaking to me, those hands lifted in pleading, her lips moving as she bids me to her side, and I cannot stir!"

The voice of the old man sank low, the veins on his forehead swelled, he stretched out his arms, then for a moment or two he was silent, and his heavy breathing and stifled sobs alone were heard in the room. After a time, becoming somewhat more calm he continued:

"My companion, in answer to my questions, told me that the old man was the Baron Jendavi, and that the girl was Marie, his daughter. I followed the carriage with my eyes until a cloud of dust alone marked its progress along the road; then, with little ceremony to my friend, I turned back and walked straight to Paris.

"It was only when was alone in my rooms that I asked myself what prompted this strange action. I had seen but for a few moments a face by the roadside, yet I believed that not one atom of the beauty of it had escaped me. In that short walk I had created to myself an ideal in a world of fancy, which ere this my imagination had never penetrated. Before, I was the scholar; life was for me in the mass of volumes that lined the walls of my rooms and of the libraries, among the thoughts and the researches of those who had left to their fellowmen an imperishable record of the labor for the good and the elevation of mankind. If I had looked into the future, it was with the hope that I should then find myself striving to follow the example of these great men, perhaps winning some of the rewards that fall to the successful in a career of letters. But such matters as home life or wife or children had never caused me a moment's thought. The change in me, then, was sudden and startling. As the scene that delights us one moment is forgotten in the beauty of the one that replaces it so did my ambition fall as the face of Marie rose up before me. A new realm of ideas was opened, but the new would not blend with the old, for the one was absorbed in the other.

"When common sense had in a measure returned to me, I began to remember that my hopes and dreams rested but on a name—'Marie Jendavi, the daughter of the Baron Jendavi, of an unknown chateau on the road to Versailles.' We were seemingly separated by as great a gulf as divides the Old World from the New. Whom did I know in Paris, then, that I could go to and say, 'I have a fancy to be introduced to the daughter of the Baron Jendavi—will you do that service for me?' Such a reflection disturbed me more than in those days I would have been willing to have confessed. Agitated with fear and hope, I paced the narrow room where I lodged, until I sank upon my bed from weariness. Who would unlock the gate that shut me from the presence of the woman I would have staked so much to have seen?

"In such a mood, I chanced to remember my letters of introduction. In my negligence and desire for solitude, I had made use of the one to the head of the University alone. The others—and they were many—lay as I had brought them from England. With some anxiety lest they should be missing, I opened my valise, and after a short search, found them intact. There was one to Monsieur Bailly, the talented and at that time popular Mayor of Paris; and another to Madame de Stael; also to Lafayette, at that time the Captain of the National Guard. The others were to citizens of less position, and I did not attach much importance to the possession of them for the purpose I had in view.

"I presented my letters at the earliest opportunity, was cordially received, and, by the instrumentality of Lafayette, introduced into the family or the Baron Jendavi. I say family; but I should add that the Baron and his daughter alone were numbered in it, he having lost his wife some ten years before I met him. He was a thorough representative of the French school of nobles as then existing; courteous to a degree, dressed with extreme care, yet without great display; of a reserved manner, and apparently devoid of affection or of sympathetic feeling. He received me for some time in his library, where he had collected many valuable treasures of literature and of art; and as he was very anxious to learn something about the men and manners of that productive set of scholars and writers who had lately adorned the clubs of London, I managed in a measure to interest him. But it was wearying work for me sitting there with that grave old man, dressed in his solemn black, the diamond buckles upon his shoes alone relieving the dulness of his attire, and knowing that Marie, so full of life and picturesqueness and color, was scampering across the great park with the dogs, or kneeling at her devotions in the chapel a very type of girlhood and purity and love. Yet those hours of heavy explanations of the peculiarities of Johnson, the foibles of Boswell, the failings of Goldsmith, were alike forgotten when at dinner I faced her, and could for some minutes be entranced with the soft beauty of her face, with the sweet gentleness of her words.

"'Ah,' you ask, 'why has my life been a mystery?' The key to this mystery is buried in those days, when no world seemed so fair as France, no woman so beautiful as Marie. I loved her as I believe no man ever better loved a woman; and she, too, returned my affection—not with a careless word, not with a half-promise made but to be broken, but with the whole out-pouring of her affectionate nature, with a love that was strong—because it was a love!

"It was but in scattered moments that I could speak to her, yet we found them all-sufficient to build for ourselves in future with every stone a wealth of happiness. But at the very foundation of our hopes we met rebuff. One night, as we returned from the little chapel, she confessed her fears to me. Her father, blind to everything around him but his own interests, had, after the fashion of his own countrymen, entered into negotiations for the barter of his daughter with an old and affluent member of one of the noble houses of France. I said nothing, but leaving her, went home to think. As I passed through the village, the peasants, many of them half-naked, all of them wanting bread, were gathered around a speaker who, in fiery terms, exhorted them to break the chains of despotism that bound them and to establish the new order. They banned me as I passed through their midst, for I was from the chateau. In the words addressed to Louis the King, 'it was no longer a revolt in France, it was a revolution.' That night, when I arrived at my lonely rooms and lay down to rest, Louis XVI. had left Paris and was on the road to St. Menehould. When he was brought back, and the citizens received him in silence, I foresaw that a crisis was rapidly approaching, and determined to make at least one effort to secure the hand of the woman I loved. I would go boldly to her father and state my wishes. He received me with his usual courtesy, treated my request with the most business-like air, refused me with a smile, regretted that other arrangements had been made.

"What could I do? Pleading with such a man would not have recompensed the loss of dignity entailed. I was dumb before him; but my brain reeled under the blow; and as I left the chateau and the great gates closed behind me, it seemed that my life had been left in that mass of stone and brick that stood over the village. Along the roadside, the ragged peasants gathered the harvest. I envied them their lot; they had their lives, perhaps the women they loved. The gay clothing of the fields, laden with the golden grain, irritated me. Why was all so fair, and I so sorrowful, so devoid of hope, by which alone man lives? Ah! the dream is ended, yet I would live my life again for a repetition of those hours.

"I returned to the city, now dark and overcast, as the whispers of the terrible reality forced themselves from the alums and the low faubourgs into the great palace and the houses of the rich. Many fled; many hid themselves in fear; none knew when the reaping would come in all its hideous intensity. I rarely left my rooms, yet I hated their loneliness. I could not stir in the streets; the surface gayety, never stilled during that period of bloodshed and vice, galled me to despair as my heart went out to the chatean, or rather to the fair woman within its walls. I would have studied—her face was on every page, her eyes looked into mine from every painting! Hope having gone, despair was followed by a deadly hatred of the man who had thus broken both our lives. In my rage I heaped obloquy upen his aged head. I have been punished; may my punishment atone!

"I waited my opportunity for revenge for nearly a year. It came. Visiting again the Jacobin Club, where nearly two years before I had heard Jean Paul Marat denounce the monarchy I listened to violent and unrestrained demands for the immediate sacrifice of the leading nobility who had had the courage to remain in their native country. The scene was one I shall never forget; the clamor of the ruffian crew—their faces rendered more repulsive as the flickering oil-lamps shed their yellow rays upon them—resounded through the vaulted chambers like the roar of distant thunder. Had you pierced into the hearts of such men you would have found no trace of affection, of good, of right knowledge, of any instinct of humanity. They were like so many wolves howling for their prey, and the sight of them would have chilled the bravest heart! I watched the proceedings from a bench in the rear of the room. At length silence was somewhat restored, and a terrible process known as the 'naming' commenced. The President rose in his seat and addressed the turbulent crowd. 'It was the intention,' he said, 'of the Clud to hasten the cause of Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity, by removing those who so prominently stood in the way of its advancement. Ah, mes enfants,' he went on, 'how great a lesson have we taught our oppressors in the past years! The flag of progress is unfurled; the fire of those who would enslave us is enkindled; we shall soon sift the ashes and sweep them away; but we must be unceasing in our work; our courage must be unfailing, our self-denial unbounding. If it is necessary for the safety of the country, wives and daughters, fathers and mothers must be handed to the care of unswerving justice. They must die!'

"The President finished, and produced a sheet of paper. A man rose among his hearers and denounced 'Bailly,' the scholarly and courteous Mayor. Another rose, another death-warrant was signed, aye, as surely as if the victim then stood upon the scaffold. I shuddered as I saw the list growing, growing, and I knew that those whose names were written there, though at the moment surrounded perhaps by wife and children, would in forty-eight hours be numbered with the dead.

"Contrast the picture, grandson: a low, vaulted, stifling room, 3000 men like fiends asking for the life's blood of many of those they had erstwhile applauded, cheered, honored. Away, perhaps not half a mile, a home, where the husband built, with his wife, loving plans for the little ones asleep above; children kissing their father as he returned from his labor, men kneeling at the feet of the women they hoped to spend their lives with, everywhere affection, home-life, brightness, godliness. And these men were to die ere the sun had twice-set!

"But to resume. As man after man rose to denounce his victim, it happened that the namers approached myself, so much so that the very member at my side began to speak. What evil spirit spoke to me then, I know not: only this, that a great wave of irrepressible anger ruahed across my mind, destroying every impulse of good, and left me for the moment as one of the wretches that sat by me. When my neighbor had finished speaking, I stood and in a loud voice denounced Monsieur le Baron Jendavi.

"'Who speaks?' said the President.

"'A bas!' shouted the crowd—'a stranger.'

"'I am a stranger, citizens,' I replied, 'but I speak in the name of Liberty, Equality, Fraternity.'

"Grandson, I lied—lied in my heart, with my tongue. I spoke rather in the name of pride, of anger, of a thirst for revenge. In that hour I destroyed my happiness for ever.

"As I heard the cries of applause, saw the name of the Baron inscribed upon the sheet, the room swam before my eyes. Tottering, half-swooning, I reached the street; but the words I had spoken yet rang in my ears; the very sky seemed red with the blood of the coming sacrifice. As I paced my own chamber a deadly spirit of exultation crept over me; the whispers of remorse I silenced, as I murmured: 'Marie is mine—mine for ever. But as her face rose before me in my self-created vision, it seemed that a great gulf lay between us; on her side the crystal streams, and the green swards, and the golden valleys, where in unending bliss the good had gained their reward; while on mine, the bleak chasms where the cries of the wrong-doers echoed from rock to rock, and where a spirit of evil descended upon all. I crushed the vision, and all the next day lay upon my bed awaiting the coming morn. The night seemed endless; I was afraid in the darkness. The low roar from the city ceased; Paris was sleeping. At every sound I started, and from a fitful doze awoke, and trembled as the white light from the moon fell upon my bed and cast heavy shadows upon the panelled walls. I could sleep no more, but watched the day breaking over the spires and domes. Cold and gray, the light struck the roofs; a workman passed on his way to his daily labor, a few carts rumbled on the pavement; the sun rose, a golden orb in a setting of mist. It was day.

"I opened my door and breathed the fresh and morning air; but I walked as one that is guilty, and felt ashamed as I stood in this great purity of nature. By and by the streets filled; the citizens, laughing and wishing 'good-day,' were mostly walking to one spot. An irresistable impulse drew me thither. It was to the Champ-de-Mars, where the guillotine stood. I can see it all again, ay, so vividly, for the scene has never left me day or night. It is my retribution. A great crowd had assembled there—a sea of faces, diabolical, fierce, making merry with death. From their midst, on a platform, rose a tall, dark object, that chilled me as I saw it—it was the guillotine.

"Then, and not till then, did I realize my crime, and with returning reason I would willingly have given my life to have saved the man I had destroyed. But it was too late. Already from the distance the roar of the crowd was borne on the wind. Those around, as the shouts of 'A bas les aristocrates!' became more distant, elbowed me to the front. There, surrounded by groaning and shooting men, whose horrid cries of execration rage in my ears, I could see, yet some way off, the waggon that bore the victims to their doom. As it drew nearer, so did the fury of the mob increase; had they been able, they would have torn the condemned limb from limb. In an agony of fear, I turned my head away, for remorse terrible, overwhelming remorse, came upon me, as the horrible deed of revenge was about to be acted. But that strange fascia again prevailed, and I was compelled to take one look at the death-cart. It was full of men and women. Men, the lights of intellectual strength and culture, now rewarded for their labors by the curses of those for whom they had labored; women, the fairest and most innocent in France, who clung, trembling and weeping, to brothers, or fathers, or lovers, so powerless to help them. A spell held my eyes.

"I looked for the Baron. He stood with his back to me, his head bowed down, buried in his hands; but clinging to his arm was a girl, with her hair streaming over her shoulders, her hands upon the neck of the man at her side. For the moment I could not realize her presence; the cart passed close to my side; she turned, and her eyes met mine. Then she stretched out those arms to me; those lips moved as if in pleading. It was the tender, loving face of Marie that looked on me, her great eyes that spoke, her arms that invited me! May heaven forgive me—I had sacrificed the daughter with the father! She was to die. Realising the terrible crime, with an awful cry I tried to force my way through the crowd, to join her in life and death; but the soldiers beat me back, the mob pressed upon me, the cart had stopped. The people and buildings around grew faint and confused before my eyes, yet, as the deadly faintness came over me, I saw that face of anguish still looking for me. Grandson, she believed that I could save her; she knows now that I had brought her to her doom. I had killed Marie, my love!"

The old man ceased speaking; he had risen from his chair, and the fire showed that he was deadly pale. His mind was again enacting that terrible scene. At length he stretched out his arms, moaning "Marie, Marie!" and fell back into his seat. His life's tale was told—my grandfather was dead.

Tabor.

BY L. A. MORRISON.

Read Luke ix., 28 to 36.

[Mount Tabor is an insulated eminence in the plain of Esdrealon, about 6 miles south-east of Nazareth, in Galilee, and is commonly regarded as the scene of the transfiguration of Christ. It is about 1800 feet, high and covered up to its summit with oak, myrtle, fir, and other shrubs, with an occasional olive tree. Its summit is a plateau of about 300 by 500 yards].

Tabor's midnight vision breaks
On our souls again, and wakes
In our hearts a wondrous thrill,
As we view the holy hill,
And the solemn night-wrapt scene,—
Fir and olive grove between.

Once again, as evening shades
Sweep adown o'er Cana's glades,
And the golden sun doth glide
To his rest in Chittim's tide,—
We can see "Our Lord" repair
Up the mountain side for prayer.

With Him are the favoured "Three,"
And they hold communion free,—
He with them, and they with Him,—
And as gathering shadows dim
All the landscape fair, they bow
Low in prayer, on Tabor's brow.

But the "Three," short vigil keep,
Ere they sink in weary sleep;
And the Master prays alone,—
Prays—and as the hours go on,
Heaven's high ransomed ones draw near,
Strong to comfort, love and cheer.

Horeb's Prophet, stern and grand,
Enters now the "Promised Land,"
And with Carmel's rugged Seer,
In the Spirit doth appear
Unto human sight, and now
Glory circles Tabor's brow;

For in Christ, all heaven hath found
Common speech and vantage ground,
Where, in fellowship complete,
Spirit may with mortal meet,
And in glad communion blend
Thought and voice, as friend with friend.

But the sleepers, in amaze
Waken, and uprising, gaze
On their Master, radiant now
With transfigured robe and brow;
Gaze with awe and dazed surprise
On these dwellers of the skies.

Never mortal eye, I ween,
Gazed on such enchanting scene;—
Those with radiance, all divine,
In translucent glory shine;
Mirror'd in refulgent light,
On the back-ground of the night.

Never yet did human ear,
Words of such vast import hear;—
They from Heaven this message bear,
That each saved immortal there
Hopes in Christ. All human ends
On His finished work depends.

Lo! a densely gathering cloud
Wraps the mountain in its shroud;
Lightnings flash athwart the gloom,
And the rolling thunders boom;
Terrorized by sight and sound,
These fall prostrate on the ground.

While a Voice spake strong and clear,
To the Master's list'ning ear;—
Making hope and courage dwell
In His heart, to finish well
All redemption's work begun,
"This is My Beloved Son."

Now the light breaks in once more,
Sin's dark night will soon be o'er;
All Love's fellowships and powers,
Lost to Earth, since Eden's hours—
In this dawning time appear,—
God may speak and men can hear.

Not as I Will.

BY HANS GOEBEL.

Not as I will, O Lord my God,
I know not what is wise or right,
Or good for me; I may not choose,
I think I would not if I might.

Not as I will, I would be led
Through all my earthly life by Thee,
Though dark and rugged oft the way,
Thou knowest what is best for me.

Not as I will, too prone to err
I am. My feet would go astray,
And wander in forbidden paths.
So should I miss the narrow way.

Not as I will. My eyes are dim,
Thou seest where the dangers be,
Lead where Thou wilt, I cannot fall
If Thou, dear Lord, art guiding me.

We pray "on earth e'en as in Heaven
Father Thy will be ever done."
Thy will makes Heaven what it is,
So shall it be on earth begun.

And when we worship at "the Throne",
And as the stars forever shine,
We'll sing to all eternity
"Thy will, O Lord, be done, not mine."

The Scar.

If we possess a treasured cup,
'Tis often burst in twain,
And then we take the pieces up
And join them once again.

And sometimes 'tis so neatly done
You scarce would be aware
The parted fragments were not one;
But still the scar was there.

Thus human hearts oft broken are,
When fond connections sever,
They heal sometimes, but still the scar
Will linger there for ever.

The British Square.

The terrible disaster to the Italian troops in the Soudan, which has thrown the Italian people into a frenzy of excitement, is exactly the fate which would have met the British troops in their famous march to Gubat, had the British square not proved impenetrable or had the stout English hearts of the soldiers, accustomed to fight almost any odds, grown faint in those two battles of twenty to one. English people have never fully appreciated the work done by British soldiers in the Soudan. The Germans, who are just now a nation of soldiers, speak of the expedition up the Nile, the march to Gubat, and the reaching of Khartoum with much admiration to this day. The fact that the English troops did not save Gordon has robbed that expedition of all its honors in English eyes.

The best way to worship God is in allaying the distress of the time and improving the condition of mankind.

RIFT AND SPRAY;

OR,

LOVE AND VENGEANCE AMONG THE SMUGGLERS.

THE MOST FASCINATING OCEAN ROMANCE SINCE THE DAYS OF COOPER AND MARYATT.

CHAPTER XXVIII.—(CONTINUED).

They saw him, then, stand up in the boat and look over the bulwarks of the cutter by clinging to its side and scrambling up a foot or two. Then he dropped into the boat again and began slowly to pull away from the Rift. Suddenly he paused. Something had attracted his observation in the water. Our friends from their boat, too, saw that something.

"What is it?" whispered Gerald.

"Hush! Nothing."

"Ah, I see now. Benjamin."

"His body. He is drowned! See! Dolan knows him now!"

They saw Dolan bow over the side of the boat and turn the body over, so that the face was visible, and then he at once recognized Benjamin.

He did not say one word, but bent to the oars and pulled quickly to the mouth of the cavern.

There was one part of the sails that closed the entrance, which could easily be pushed aside so as to allow a boat to pass out, and it was toward that part that Dolan rowed.

He was evidently escaping with a treasure-chest from the cavern; and then Martin said to Joseph:

"Shall we stop him?"

"No," interposed Gerald. "Let him go."

"But it's very unfair. The rascal is making away with the money of the whole crew."

"He cannot go far."

"Who knows? He may have some cutter or schooner waiting for him in the offing; and, before daylight, may be far enough off. It seems a hard thing to let him go easily."

"I cannot control you, sighed Gerald. "Do as you please."

Grace crept closer to Gerald.

"No," said Joseph to Martin. "Let us land our cargo here first, and then I have something to say to you. Dolan will only go to the cottage to-night. you may depend upon that. I have been on the lookout till within the last hour, and there is nothing in the offing waiting for him. Besides, we can watch his course. If he goes seaward, let us overhaul him, if he double the point, we shall know he goes to the cottage."

"Be it so."

Dolan reached the opening of the sea-cave into the bay. He put aside the sail cloth and rowed out into the open water.

"Now, pull away with a will," said Joseph "we shall soon see what course he intends to take."

They were through the opening in the sail-cloth in another minute and then they saw Dolan making evidently for the promontory, on the other side of which was the bit of coast on which stood the cottages.

"That is it," said Joseph. "He is not quite off yet. Now for the ravine in the cliff."

"Ay, ay," said Martin; "and it's just as well, Joseph, that you and I know where Dolan's strong box is."

"Hush!"

"What now?"

"Do you see that dark object out yonder, southward?"

"Ahem! A schooner."

"You did not see it from your lookout, Joseph."

"I did not."

"Boat ahoy!"

So suddenly was his challenge that both Martin and Joseph were completely nonplussed by it and they heard the vigorous strokes of a pair or more of oars in their immediate vicinity before they could make up their minds what to do.

"Pull back," said Martin. It won't do! No no! not to the cave!"

"Boat ahoy! We will fire into you if don't lay to. Boat ahoy!"

"Friends!" cried Gerald, in a load voice. "Who hails?"

"Revenue!"

"Bah!" said Captain Mocquet.

"Now you've been and gone and done it, Master Gerald," said Martin. "It's a coast guard boat."

Another moment and a boat-hook gave the little boat of the Rift a vigorous pull and she was alongside a long galley, in which were some ten or twelve men.

"What's all this about," said a voice; and why are you cruising in the bay at such an hour as this?"

Gerald was puzzled to know what to say—and so was Martin— for a variety of emotions were busy at the hearts of both of them. Gerald had never for a moment contemplated—as one of the incidents of his and Grace's escape from the caverns in the cliff and from Dolan—that they were to betray the smuggler's haunt.

And Martin and Joseph had the greatest possible dislike to committing the crew of the Rift, as a whole, to Dolan's villainies. Captain Mocquet, too, ran a great risk of being got into serious trouble if he should fall into the hands of the English authorities.

Take it, then, on the whole—although in the momentary dread of a stray shot finding its way into the boat and possibly hitting either Grace or Marie, Gerald had answered the hail—neither he nor those with him knew what to say.

"Are you all dumb?" said the voice again. "Bring a lantern forward here!"

"Ay, sir."

It was then that a most unexpected ally stepped, so to speak, to the rescue and Mr. Shuffles said at once:

"Lieutenant Anderson, I think——"

"Hilloa! Who's that?"

"I, sir! I, Mr. Suffles, attorney-at-law, of Queen street. Don't you know my voice, sir?"

"Yes, I do. What on earth brings you at this time of night at sea, Mr. Suffles?"

"Why, sir, my two little girls have had a fancy, you see, to come."

"Your two little girls? Oh—ah! I see. The young ladies are with you. Well, Mr. Suffles, if I didn't know you for a respectable man and that you had your two little girls with you, I should almost think you were smuggling."

"Oh, dear, no! My dears, you won't see it."

"See what?"

"The moon in the caves."

"Oh, that's it, is it! Ha! ha! Well, Mr. Suffles, you and your family are very much more romantic than I thought you all were. Good night. I can tell you boatmen, that there's a squall brewing."

"You don't say so, sir! Bless my heart and life! And what, Lieutenant Anderson, may you be about here in the bay at this time of night?"

"Why, we have captured a good cargo to-night and we are on the lookout for another."

"Oh, yes! Ha! Good night."

"Good night! Cast off, my men."

The revenue galley disappeared in the darkness.

"Thank you, Mr. Suffles," said Martin.

"Oh, don't mention it. Business, you know, is business. I'm ever so much better; and if Dolan goes off and you, Mr. Martin, set up in the same line of business, I hope you won't forget your very humble servant, Charles Olympus Dufrain Suffles, Esq., who will be only to happy to purchase any cargo of you on reasonable terms."

"Oh, you will, will you?" said the voice of Lieutenant Anderson. "I thought we should have you some day, Mr. Suffles. You have been long suspected. You are my prisoner, sir, and all in this boat."

CHAPTER XXIX.

DOLAN SEEKS REVENGE BY TREACHERY.

When Captain Morton gave chase to Dolan in the boats of the Nautilus, it was soon very evident that the accurate knowledge which the smuggler captain had of every set, every ripple and every eddy of the tide gave him a great advantage.

Notwithstanding the utmost exertions of Captain Morton, Dolan succeeded in reaching the promontory and in rounding it at least five minutes before Captain Morton.

The first thing, then, that Morton saw when his own boat rounded the promontory was the boat that Dolan had gone in, floating bottom upward on the surface of the sea, and one of the oars a few yards from it.

Captain Morton paused a moment or two, and then he said to the sailor who was with him:

"Let us right the boat. The rascal may be beneath it yet. I have heard of such things."

The boat was righted, but no signs of Captain Dolan were visible. Then Captain Morton looked carefully about him, but there was nothing to be seen but the bare rock and waters of the bay and the rugged cliffs.

"To the cottage—to the cottage!" he said, and then he and his companion pulled back again to the cottage on the beach; and as they beached their boat they saw that there was a great commotion among the women and children who inhabited the huts.

A captain's guard of marines was on the spot, and the moment Captain Morton landed he was surrounded by several of the marines and a sergeant.

"What is all this?" he said.

"Our orders, sir, are to make prisoners of all who land here."

"Very well. Where is your officer?"

"In the cottage, sir. March!"

Captain Morton soon reached the cottage, and was met at the door by the captain of the marines, to whom he said:

"Your men, sir, have very properly, no doubt, in pursuance of their orders, made me prisoner; but I am Captain Morton, of the United States Navy, and that is my yacht, the Nautilus, yonder."

"Sir, I am delighted to make your acquaintance. Admiral Clifford is much concerned about you. A conflict took place last night here between some smugglers and the coast guard, and I have had orders to hold these cottages as a port, and arrest all cruisers who cannot give an account of themselves."

"Sir, is there a female in this cottage—Mrs. Wagner?"

"There was."

"Was?"

"Yes. She has been marched off to jail, I fancy, as it is found she was in league with the man Dolan, who is now clearly ascertained to be a smuggler, and to command and own a cutter, which goes by all sorts of names, but which is properly, we believe, called the Rift."

"Will you pardon me, sir? I must seek this woman at once, as she is in possession of information so important to my peace that the whole object of my journey to England hangs upon it. Did you say to jail, sir, they had taken her?"

"I fancy so. A couple of revenue officers took her. There are several of them at the upper end of the lanes, and they can doubtless tell you about it."

"Pardon my abruptness—good day, sir."

The officers bowed and Captain Morton hastened up the narrow lane that led toward the town, but when he gained the top of it, he was informed that Mrs. Wagner was conveyed, in a sinking state, to the common county jail, which was some five miles off. With a sigh for the delay that all this occasioned him, Captain Morton started off on the road indicated to him, and from a bit of rising ground which he soon reached, he was able to see a long way about him, and he could not refrain from casting a glance both seaward and landward as he proceeded.
